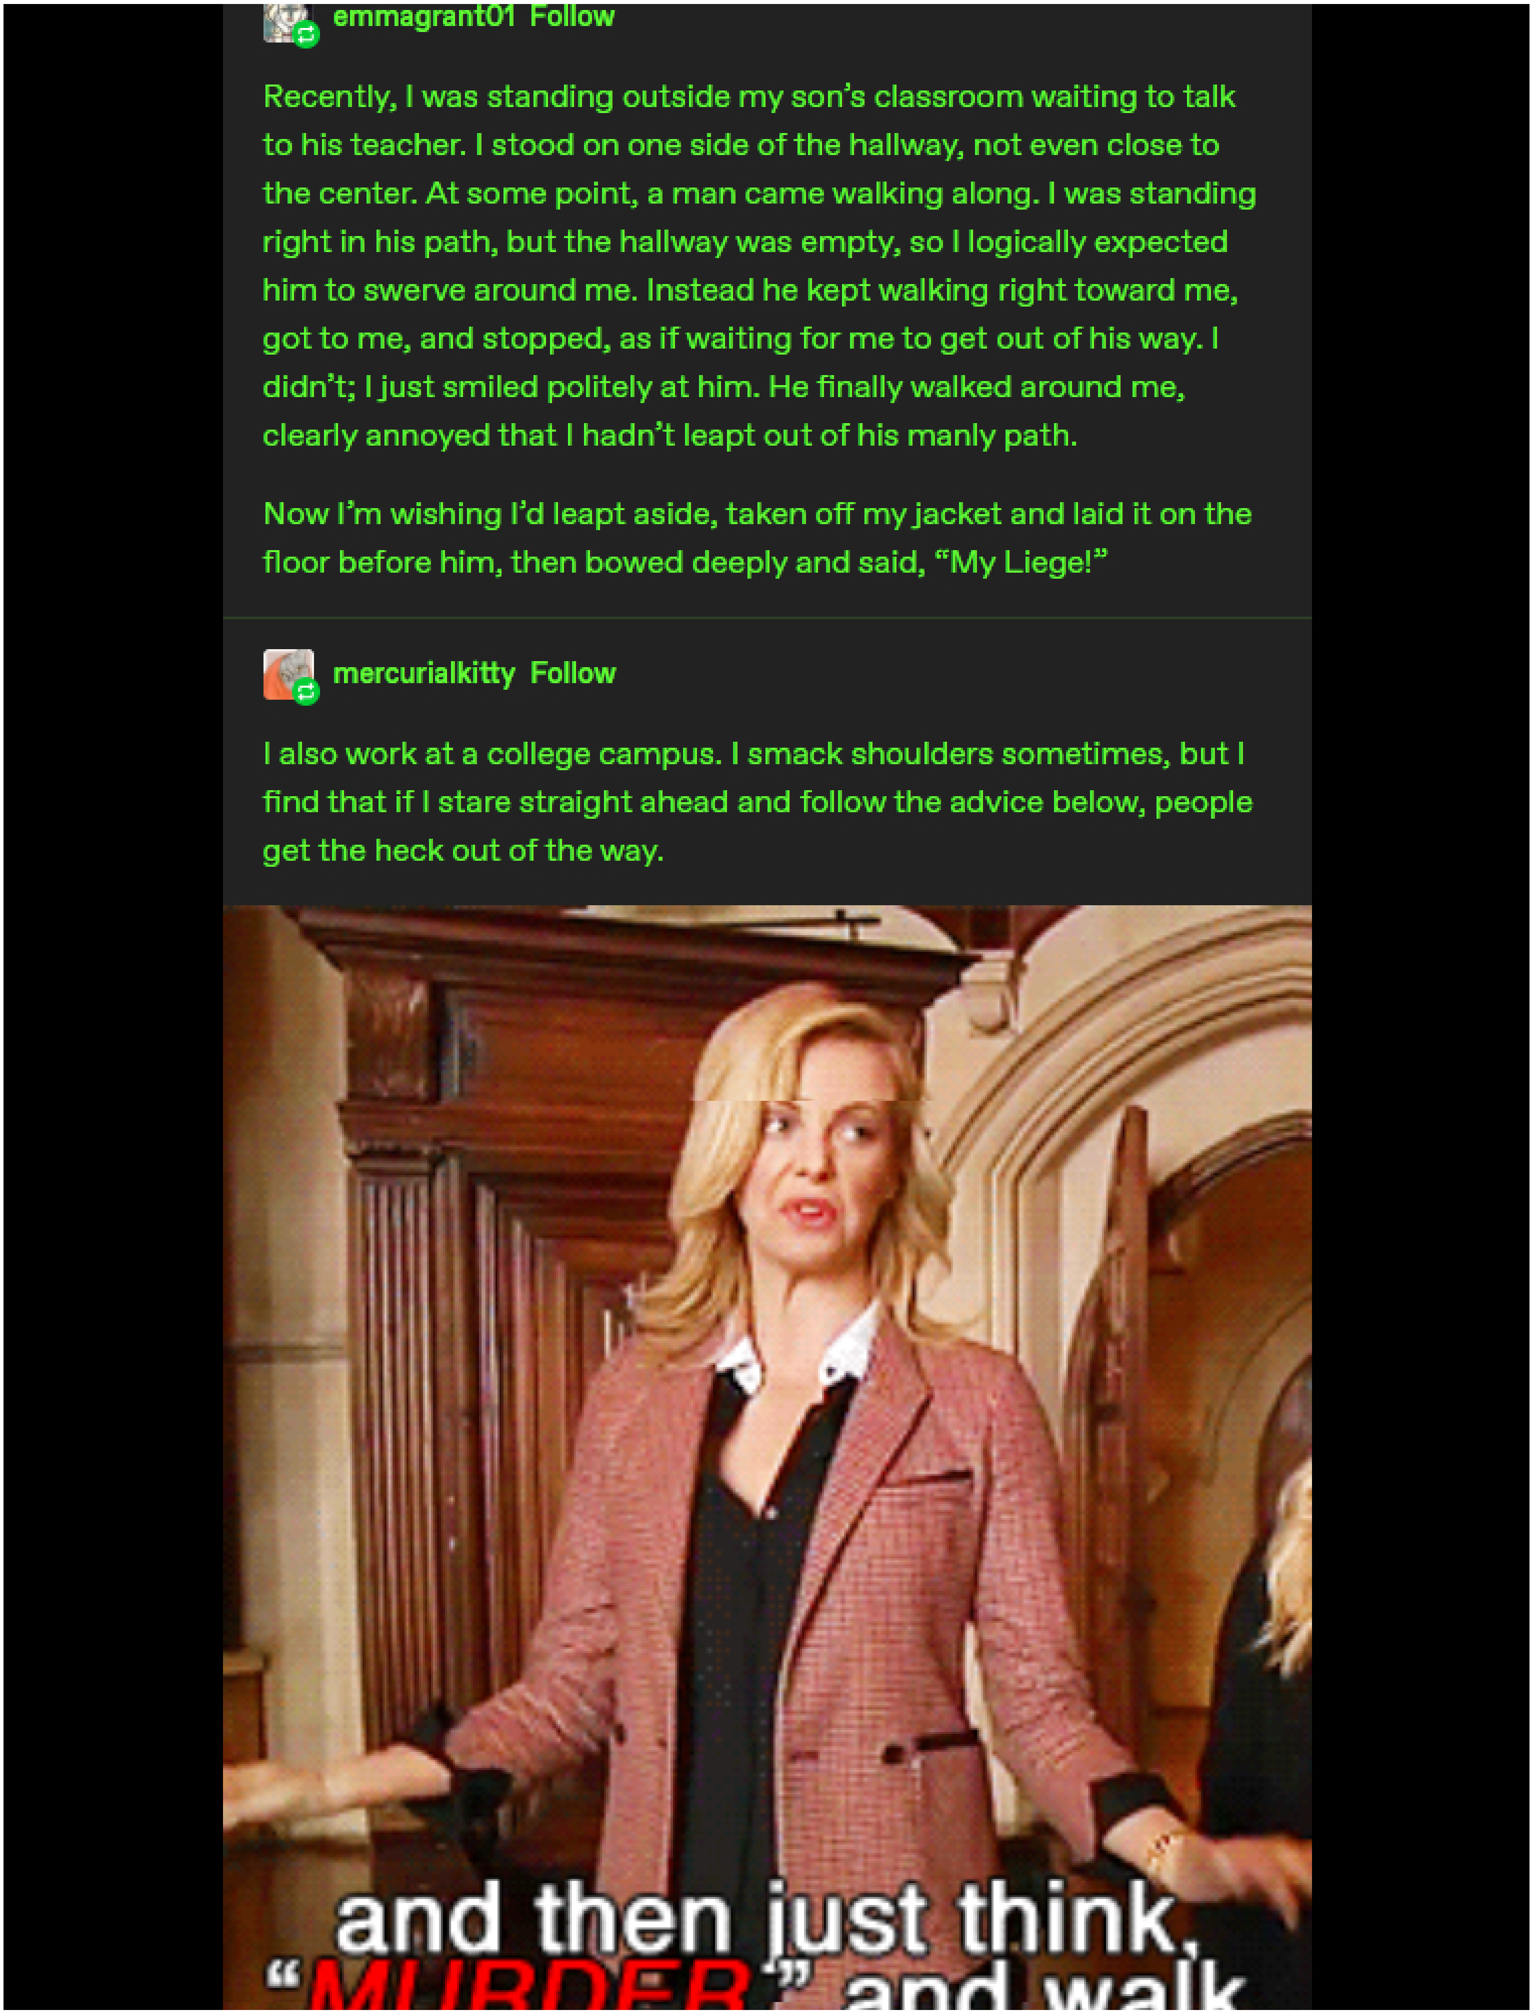
clevermanka Follow

I work (and walk) on a college campus. I've lost count of how many men I've smacked shoulders with.

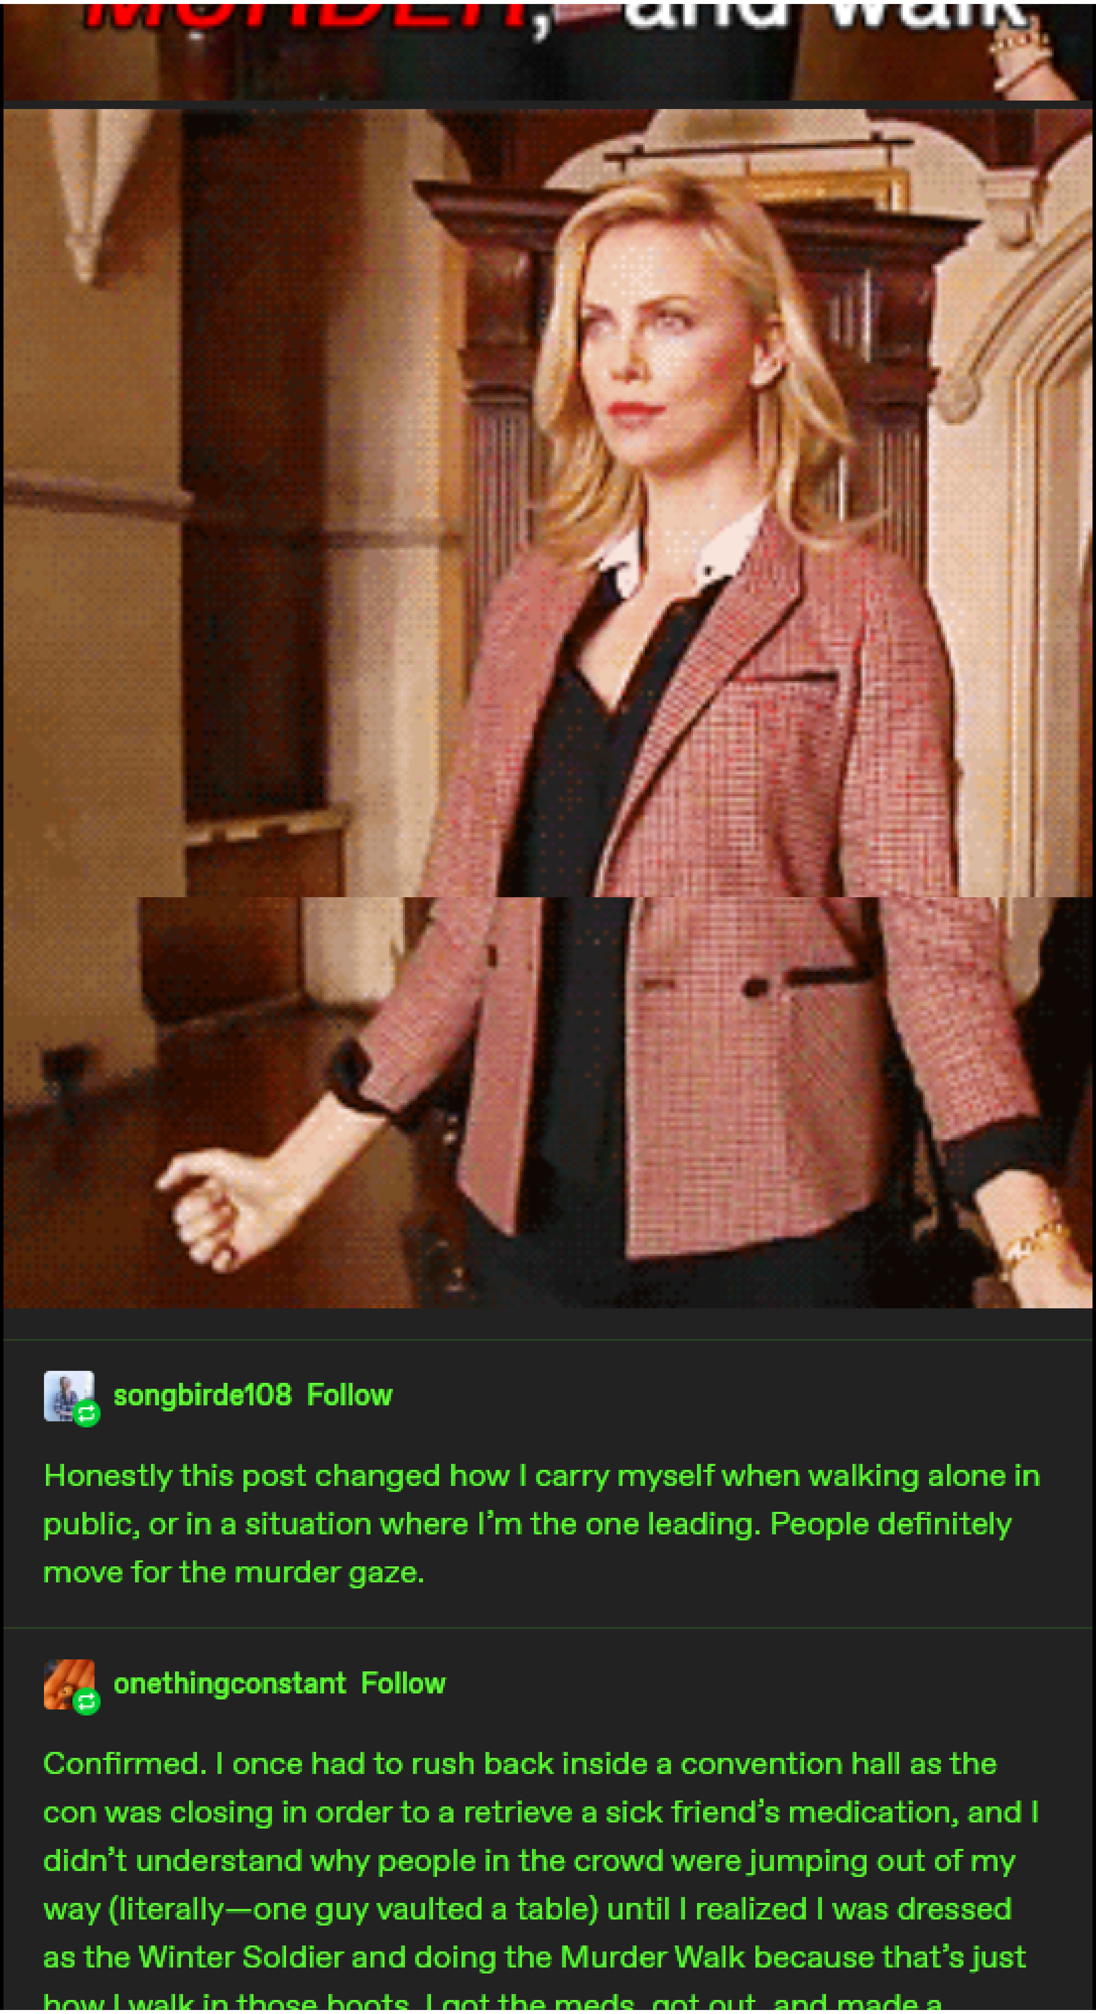


Recently, I was standing outside my son's classroom waiting to talk to his teacher. I stood on one side of the hallway, not even close to the center. At some point, a man came walking along. I was standing right in his path, but the hallway was empty, so I logically expected him to swerve around me. Instead he kept walking right toward me, got to me, and stopped, as if waiting for me to get out of his way. I didn't; I just smiled politely at him. He finally walked around me, clearly annoyed that I hadn't leapt out of his manly path.

Now I'm wishing I'd leapt aside, taken off my jacket and laid it on the floor before him, then bowed deeply and said, "My Liege!"

I also work at a college campus. I smack shoulders sometimes, but I find that if I stare straight ahead and follow the advice below, people get the heck out of the way.

and then just think, "MURDER," and walk



songbirde108 Follow

Honestly this post changed how I carry myself when walking alone in public, or in a situation where I'm the one leading. People definitely move for the murder gaze.

onethingconstant Follow

Confirmed. I once had to rush back inside a convention hall as the con was closing in order to a retrieve a sick friend's medication, and I didn't understand why people in the crowd were jumping out of my way (literally—one guy vaulted a table) until I realized I was dressed as the Winter Soldier and doing the Murder Walk because that's just how I walk in those boots. I got the meds, got out, and made a how I walk in these boots. I got the meds, got out, and made a mental note.

I repeated the experiment later, wearing the boots but otherwise my usual clothing and mimicking the expression I thought I'd had at that moment. People parted like I was Charlton Heston.

I now wear that style of boots whenever possible. I recently had a man do a double-take as I walked by and ask me, politely, where I had served because I "looked like a soldier." I'm not current or former military. I was wearing a flowy purple peasant top and looked as un-soldierlike as possible.

Moral of the story: wear comfortable shoes, square your shoulders, and walk like you've been sent to murder Captain America.

The Chrome browser exists to show you ads and track where you go so that Google can show you more ads. Please stop using Chrome. Firefox is open source, and while Mozilla is not perfect, it isn't actively fucking evil the way Google is. It has a bazillion plugins, including various (FREE!) ad block plugins (I recommend uBlock Origins, which will even block YouTube ads – you can watch videos without interruptions again!). It will also function very effectively with a lot more tabs open than Chrome. I've got around 800 tabs open right now (not loaded, of course, except for maybe 2 dozen; it's been a heavy browsing day), and my wife has between 2k and 3k at any time.

We are in the New Browser Wars. This time there's a helluva lot of money up for grabs, because a lot of it is about running those ads. Monopolies are bad for consumers.

Just go download Firefox.

achievemenhunt Follow

Firefox plugins I 100% recommend if you don't want to be tracked (and want to cost corporations money)

AdNauseam is an adblocker that generates false clicks on the ads it blocks, which costs the corporations that pay for them money.

Privacy Possum messes with the tracking data collected about you, rendering it essentially useless

TrackMeNot generates random search terms across sites, meaning that any data collected about things you actually search is buried in a sea of random bullshit. Makes it very hard for people to figure out what you're actually doing. You can block terms in the options, which means it won't search for anything incriminating on your behalf (I think the word bomb is blocked by default)

WhatCampaign replaces tracking analytics used in website code with data that can't be used to track you. I'm pretty sure it replaces it with "fuck off" by default.

I'm not adding links because tumblr will not show this up if I do, but you can search these on the Firefox addons site and they'll come up.

honestly pointing out that wellerman is a work song about having a shit job with a shit employer and that it isn't some kind of endorsement of the slave trade is valid and all but like are we not going to talk about how ridiculous the idea of "cancelling" a song from the 19th century for having problematic themes is

somecunttookmyurl

broke: you should stop singing or listening to the wellerman because it's about the slave trade and suppression of native maori woke: wellerman is literally about working in indentured servitude for an oppressive company and isn't a fucking endoresement of that do you even understand what work songs are, like, as a genre jesus give me strength bespoke: debating the moral purity of a song from the 19th century is fucking stupid

honeycirrus Follow

@karmenofchaos @banjedo I thought they were KIDDING about the discourse about Wellerman

banjedo Follow

they are not!

yes, the company wellerman was oppressing maori people, but in a lot of ways it's like how amazon is now. the people that work there have no choice but to work there, and they themselves can't do anything about the fact that it's oppressing another group because they need money to live, because that's how capitalistic monopolies work.

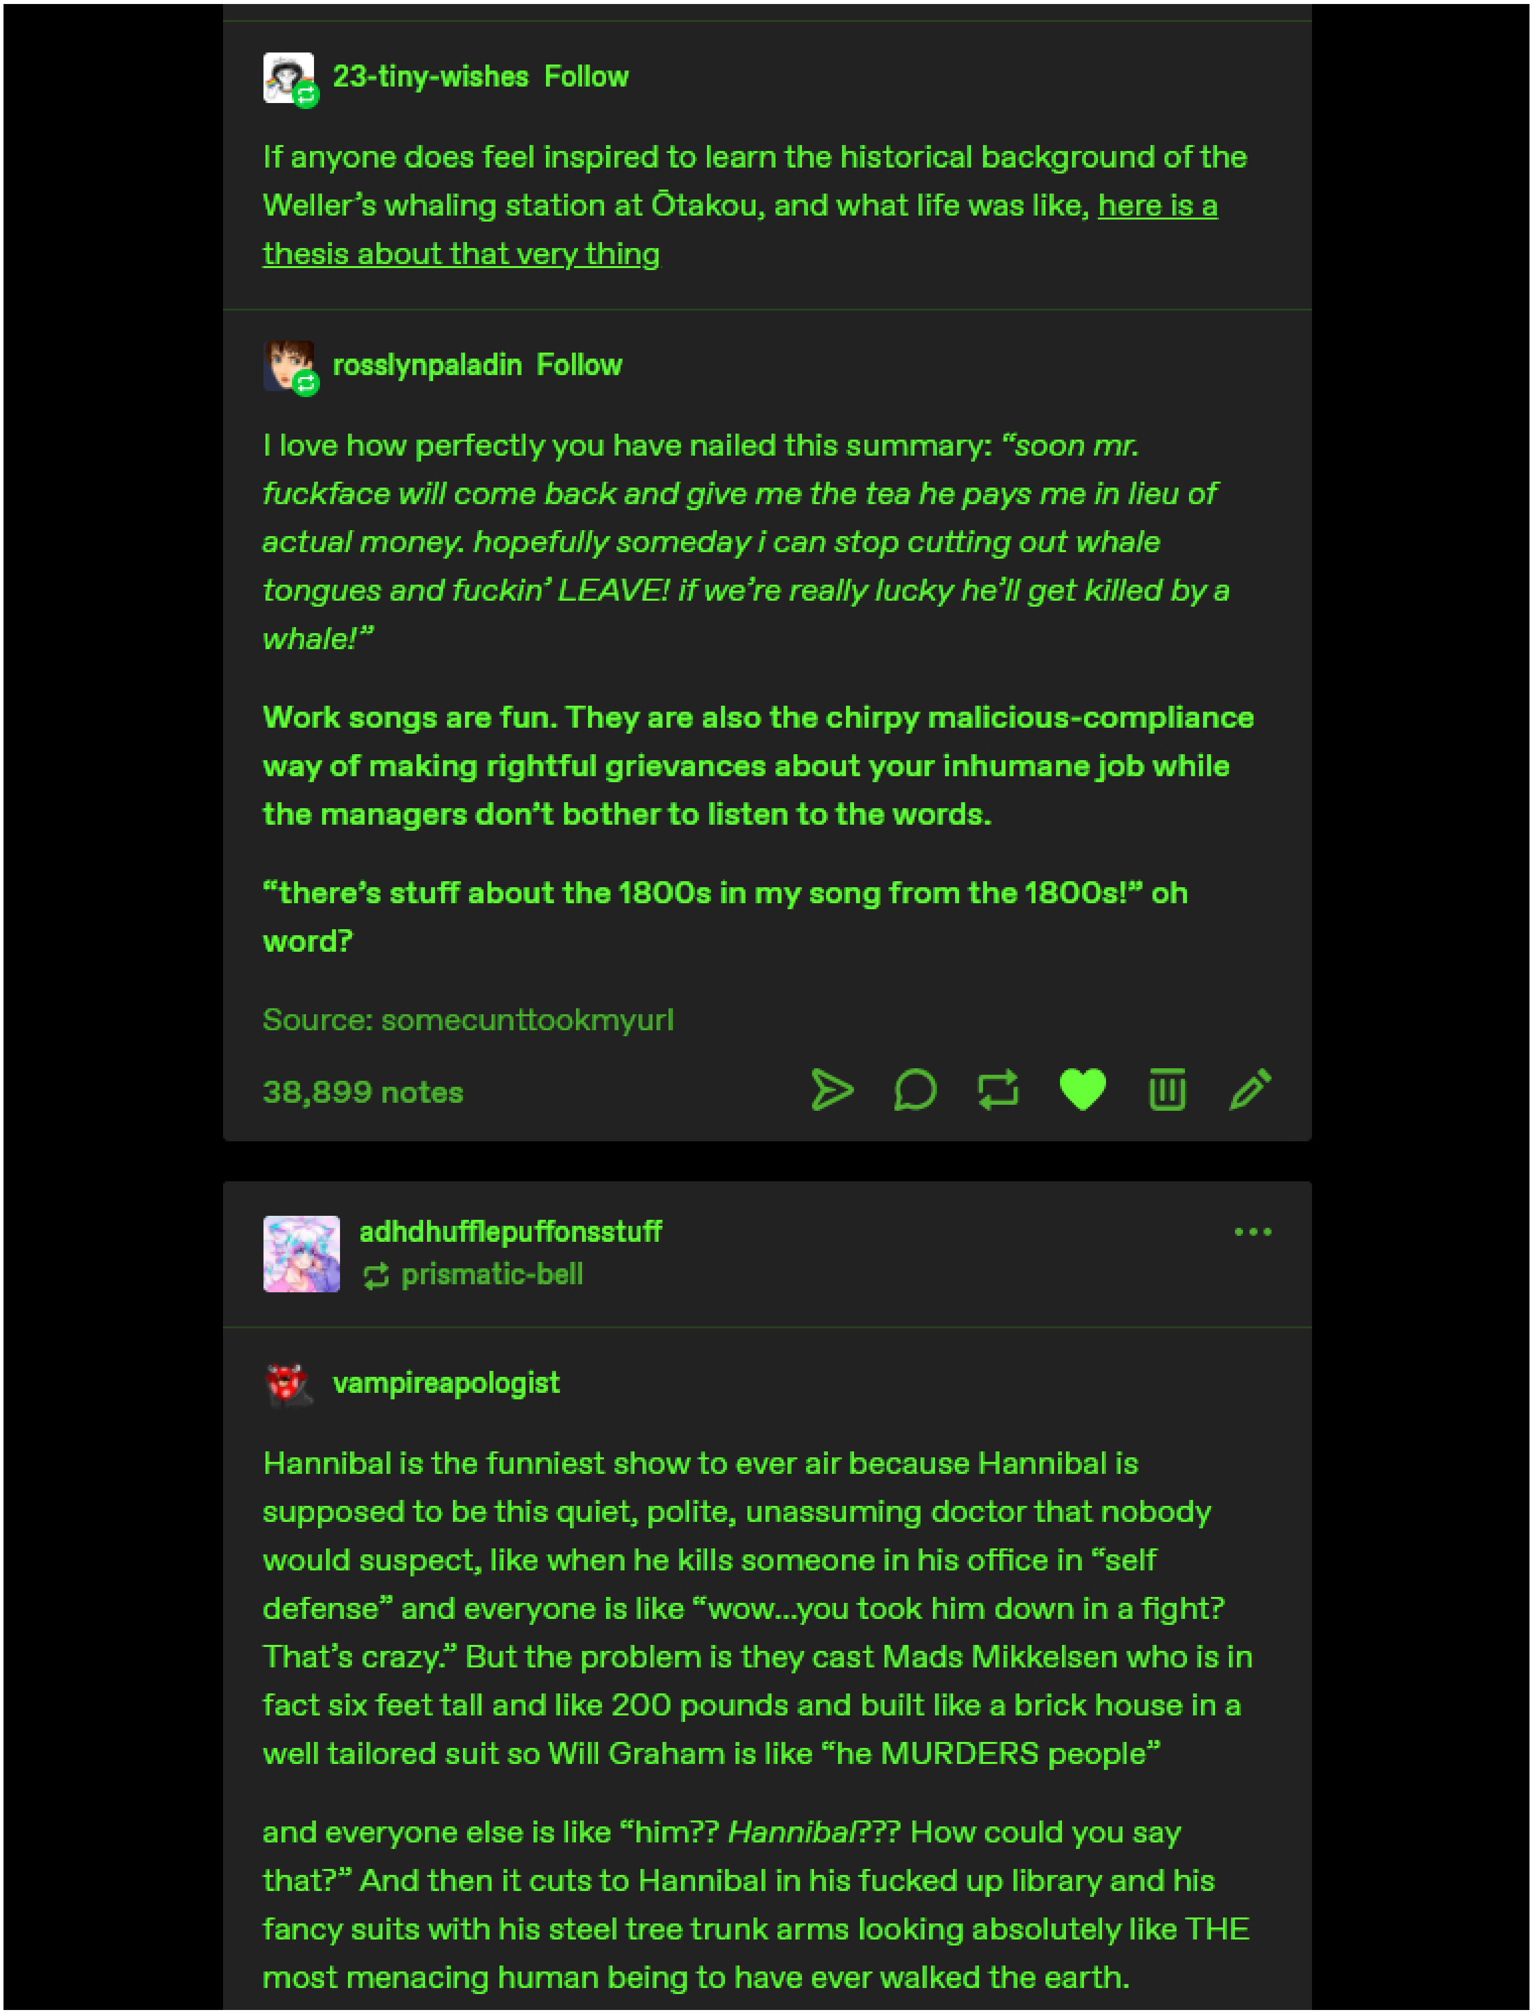
somecunttookmyurl

you are correct! it is also important to note roughly 1/3 of the shore whalers involved here were themselves native maori and would have joined in with singing "soon mr. fuckface will come back and give me the tea he pays me in lieu of actual money. hopefully someday i can stop cutting out whale tongues and fuckin' LEAVE! if we're really lucky he'll get killed by a whale!"

no part of this song is remotely positive towards the weller brothers, let alone "glorifying violence against maori" or whatever the fuck.

but the point remains that trying to cancel a song from the 1800s for referencing problematic themes is really really stupid because it's acting like a) a colonialist-era work song referencing the colonialist system in which they worked is somehow news and b) that it would be at all reasonable to expect otherwise.

"there's stuff about the 1800s in my song from the 1800s!" oh word? on god?



23-tiny-wishes Follow

If anyone does feel inspired to learn the historical background of the Weller's whaling station at Ōtakou, and what life was like, here is a thesis about that very thing

rosslynpaladin Follow

I love how perfectly you have nailed this summary: "soon mr. fuckface will come back and give me the tea he pays me in lieu of actual money. hopefully someday i can stop cutting out whale tongues and fuckin' LEAVE! if we're really lucky he'll get killed by a whale!"

Work songs are fun. They are also the chirpy malicious-compliance way of making rightful grievances about your inhumane job while the managers don't bother to listen to the words.

"there's stuff about the 1800s in my song from the 1800s!" oh word?

Hannibal is the funniest show to ever air because Hannibal is supposed to be this quiet, polite, unassuming doctor that nobody would suspect, like when he kills someone in his office in "self defense" and everyone is like "wow...you took him down in a fight? That's crazy." But the problem is they cast Mads Mikkelsen who is in fact six feet tall and like 200 pounds and built like a brick house in a well tailored suit so Will Graham is like "he MURDERS people" and everyone else is like "him?? Hannibal??? How could you say that?" And then it cuts to Hannibal in his fucked up library and his fancy suits with his steel tree trunk arms looking absolutely like THE most menacing human being to have ever walked the earth.

vampireapologist

this show exists in an alternate reality where we the viewer have to accept that someone could say "there's something off about that guy" and then people who have spent their whole lives profiling dangerous murderers sit down in a library with this man and are like, "I honestly don't see what you mean"

trans men in history will quite literally be like "i only want to live as a man and be seen as a man, i refer to myself exclusively as a man, i have taken extreme pains to appear and sound male, i will go to great lengths to prevent sexual or romantic partners from seeing my body, if i am discovered having sex with other men at no point will i attempt to evade consequences by claiming to be a woman in disguise, i insist upon being treated as a man even in private by literally everyone who knows me, if i cannot get the people in my life to keep my secret i will physically pack up and go somewhere where nobody recognizes me so that i am unequivocally recognized only as male, i will literally fly into a violent rage and physically attack or threaten anyone who calls me a woman, i want my personal letters burned when i die, i want my body to be cremated/to be buried without any examination so no one will see it, and i want to be remembered as a man even in death," and people will still be like, "this is clearly a lesbian!"

listen supernatural is bad and the vast majority of us are aware that it is bad and love it anyway because it is just specifically the right kind of bad. but. unironically, i sometimes get Upset because a lot of concepts and ideas and lore spn uses/creates are fucking COOL but their coolness cannot be explored properly because of per season yu-gi-oh stakes. like, just off the top of my head:

- an afterlife that is neither heaven nor hell but rather a fathomless void of an entity that is capable of conscious thought but wishes it wasn't, with its only motivation being "quiet, so i can sleep"
- a "mother of all monsters" / vague lesser goddess from the dawn of time, as the creator of all earthly supernatural creatures, who feels genuine maternal love towards these creatures, making her inherently connected to mothers and motherhood itself as she predated humans and was in effect the first mother of any kind
- the portrayal of abrahamic god as a manipulative, abusive father to lucifer and the other archangels and the effects of that on their psyches being realistic responses to trauma - running away from it (lucifer, gabriel) or hardening yourself against it (michael, raphael)

- the idea of angels having no natural inclination towards free will per god's design of them as soldiers, and that their meddling in human affairs is not benevolent but authoritarian
- the whole thing with vessels and coercive "consent"
- classy kitschy 40s secret society, but with monsters
- virus that makes you kill people but like not as a zombie or anything you just really wanna stab people
- etc

you feel me?

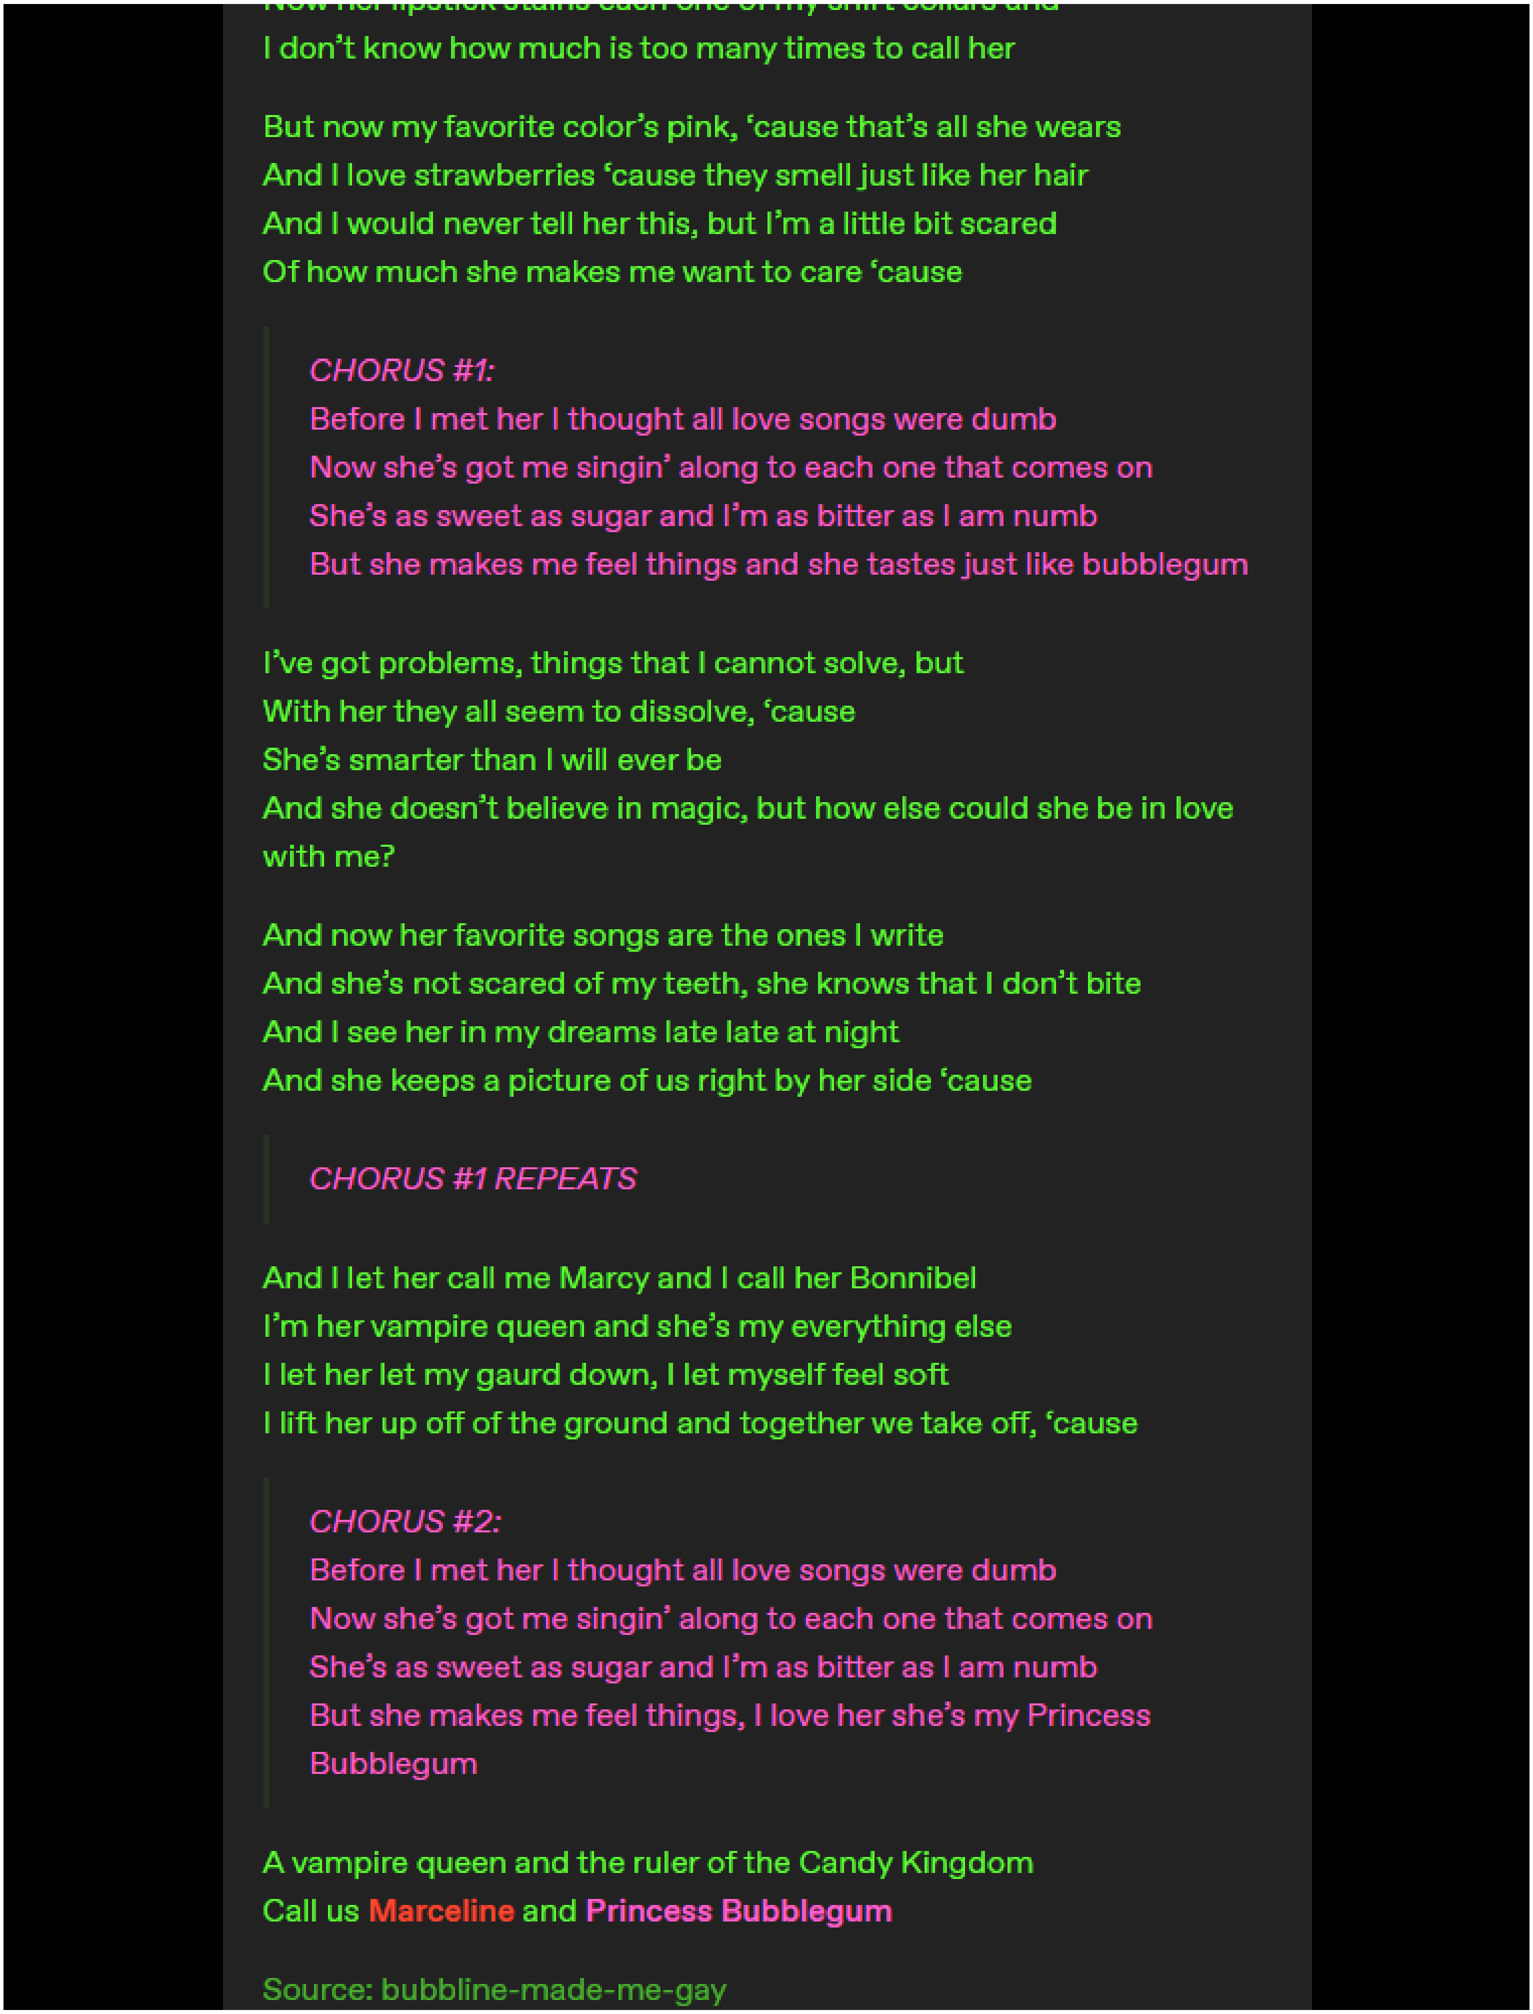
From Marcy To Bonnibel (Lyrics)

I met her when I was low (a thousand years ago)
We were friends first, yeah we took things slow (oh, how was I to know?)
Now her lipstick stains each one of my shirt collars and



Now her lipstick stains each one of my shirt collars and I don't know how much is too many times to call her

But now my favorite color's pink, 'cause that's all she wears
And I love strawberries 'cause they smell just like her hair
And I would never tell her this, but I'm a little bit scared
Of how much she makes me want to care 'cause

> CHORUS #1:
> Before I met her I thought all love songs were dumb
> Now she's got me singin' along to each one that comes on > She's as sweet as sugar and I'm as bitter as I am numb
> But she makes me feel things and she tastes just like bubblegum

I've got problems, things that I cannot solve, but
With her they all seem to dissolve, 'cause
She's smarter than I will ever be
And she doesn't believe in magic, but how else could she be in love with me?

And now her favorite songs are the ones I write
And she's not scared of my teeth, she knows that I don't bite
And I see her in my dreams late late at night
And she keeps a picture of us right by her side 'cause

> CHORUS #1 REPEATS

And I let her call me Marcy and I call her Bonnibel
I'm her vampire queen and she's my everything else
I let her let my gaurd down, I let myself feel soft
I lift her up off of the ground and together we take off, 'cause

> CHORUS #2:
> Before I met her I thought all love songs were dumb
> Now she's got me singin' along to each one that comes on
> She's as sweet as sugar and I'm as bitter as I am numb
> But she makes me feel things, I love her she's my Princess Bubblegum

Continuing my random observations from the guidebook, I noticed two tiny, easy to miss figures at the foot of the stairs in the illustration of Elysian. I think this is to show the scale of the temple building, which I've always though of as not being very big. But this really gives you a sense of scale! Just the arch way, judging by the height of the figure, is probably at least 5 stores tall.

These drawings for the Outer Senshi house also gives you an idea just how big their house is. The manga's only shown the exterior from the front, but this house is like a chateau! I knew Haruka and Michiru are rich but this really drives that home. 🤣

I’m going to get sappy with you all for a moment: I started this drawing seriously again in May of this year, and I had no idea it would take off the way it has. And I don't just mean followers obviously—I mean the comments, the encouragement, the support, the shared Loki love. It's been amazing. I went to school for illustration, but until I picked up the ipad this year, I'd barely done any artwork since college. It's been incredible coming back to that, realising that I'm not a failure as an artist just because I needed space, and that I can still do the things I used to. More than that, I've already improved miles in my work since I started playing with procreate back in April.

It's just really meant a lot to me, to have folks sharing in the love I put into these pieces. May 2021 be filled with more Loki goodness, and a little less stress would be nice. 🤣 🐍

Welcome to The Satanic Temple

Our Beliefs:

Seven Fundamental Tenets

I One should strive to act with compassion and empathy toward all creatures in accordance with reason.

II The struggle for justice is an ongoing and necessary pursuit that should prevail over laws and institutions.

III One's body is inviolable, subject to one's own will alone.

IV The freedoms of others should be respected, including the freedom to offend. To willfully and unjustly encroach upon the freedoms of another is to forgo one's own.

V Beliefs should conform to one's best scientific understanding of the world. One should take care never to distort scientific facts to fit one's beliefs.

VI People are fallible. If one makes a mistake, one should do one's best to rectify it and resolve any harm that might have been caused.

VII Every tenet is a guiding principle designed to inspire nobility in action and thought. The spirit of compassion, wisdom, and justice should always prevail over the written or spoken word.

After discovering The Satanic Temple via TikTok I decided to join up and I have been accepted. Not gonna lie I'm very tempted to buy some bits from their website.

Nah earthbenders had something to do with this necarion

Postpiles like this occur when large pools of basalt cool under a glacier. The lava freezes on all 6 sides, and then slowly cools on the interior. But because it shrinks as it solidifies (unlike water), that puts the interior under tremendous internal stresses, which tend to break along hexagons (with occasional pentagons and septagons thrown in) because that's a shape that tesselates while also minimizing perimeter to area ratio (ie the least amount of high-energy cracking needed per volume). And then at some point something weathers the top and sides so you can see it. And yes they are this cool in person.

This formation is close to a glacier. Not sure which one, but you can tell from the telltale blue-green water, which indicates a high concentration of the type of superfine sediment that you get in glacial runoff. And that is also amazing to see in person (water is actually fairly rarely really blue).

The only thing that bothers me about the passage of time is that I have no idea what fashion trends that people in 20 years will find to be incredibly weird, hilarious, or charming. I lived through the early 2000s. I thought we were just being normal. I really thought that spiked hair was cool. I wore shirts that were so plastered in sequins and rhinestones that I could not bend over in them. What am I doing currently that will be confusing and bad in five years? No idea. Maybe I should just stop caring and get my hair permed like it's the 80s.

The Three Laws of Fandom

If you wish to take part in any fandom, you need to accept and respect these three laws.

If you aren't able to do that, then you need to realise that your actions are making fandom unsafe for creators. That you are stifling creativity.

Like vaccination, fandom only works if everyone respects these rules. Creators need to be free to make their fanart, fanfics and all other content without fear of being harassed or concern-trolled for their creative choices, no matter whether you happen to like that content or not.

The First Law of Fandom

Don't Like; Don't Read (DL;DR)

It is up to you what you see online. It is not anyone else's place to tell you what you should or should not consume in terms of content; it is not up to anyone else to police the internet so that you do not see things you do not like. At the same time, it is not up to YOU to police fandom to protect yourself or anyone else, real or hypothetical.

There are tools out there to help protect you if you have triggers or squicks. Learn to use them, and to take care of your own mental health. If you are consuming fan-made content and you find that you are disliking it - STOP.

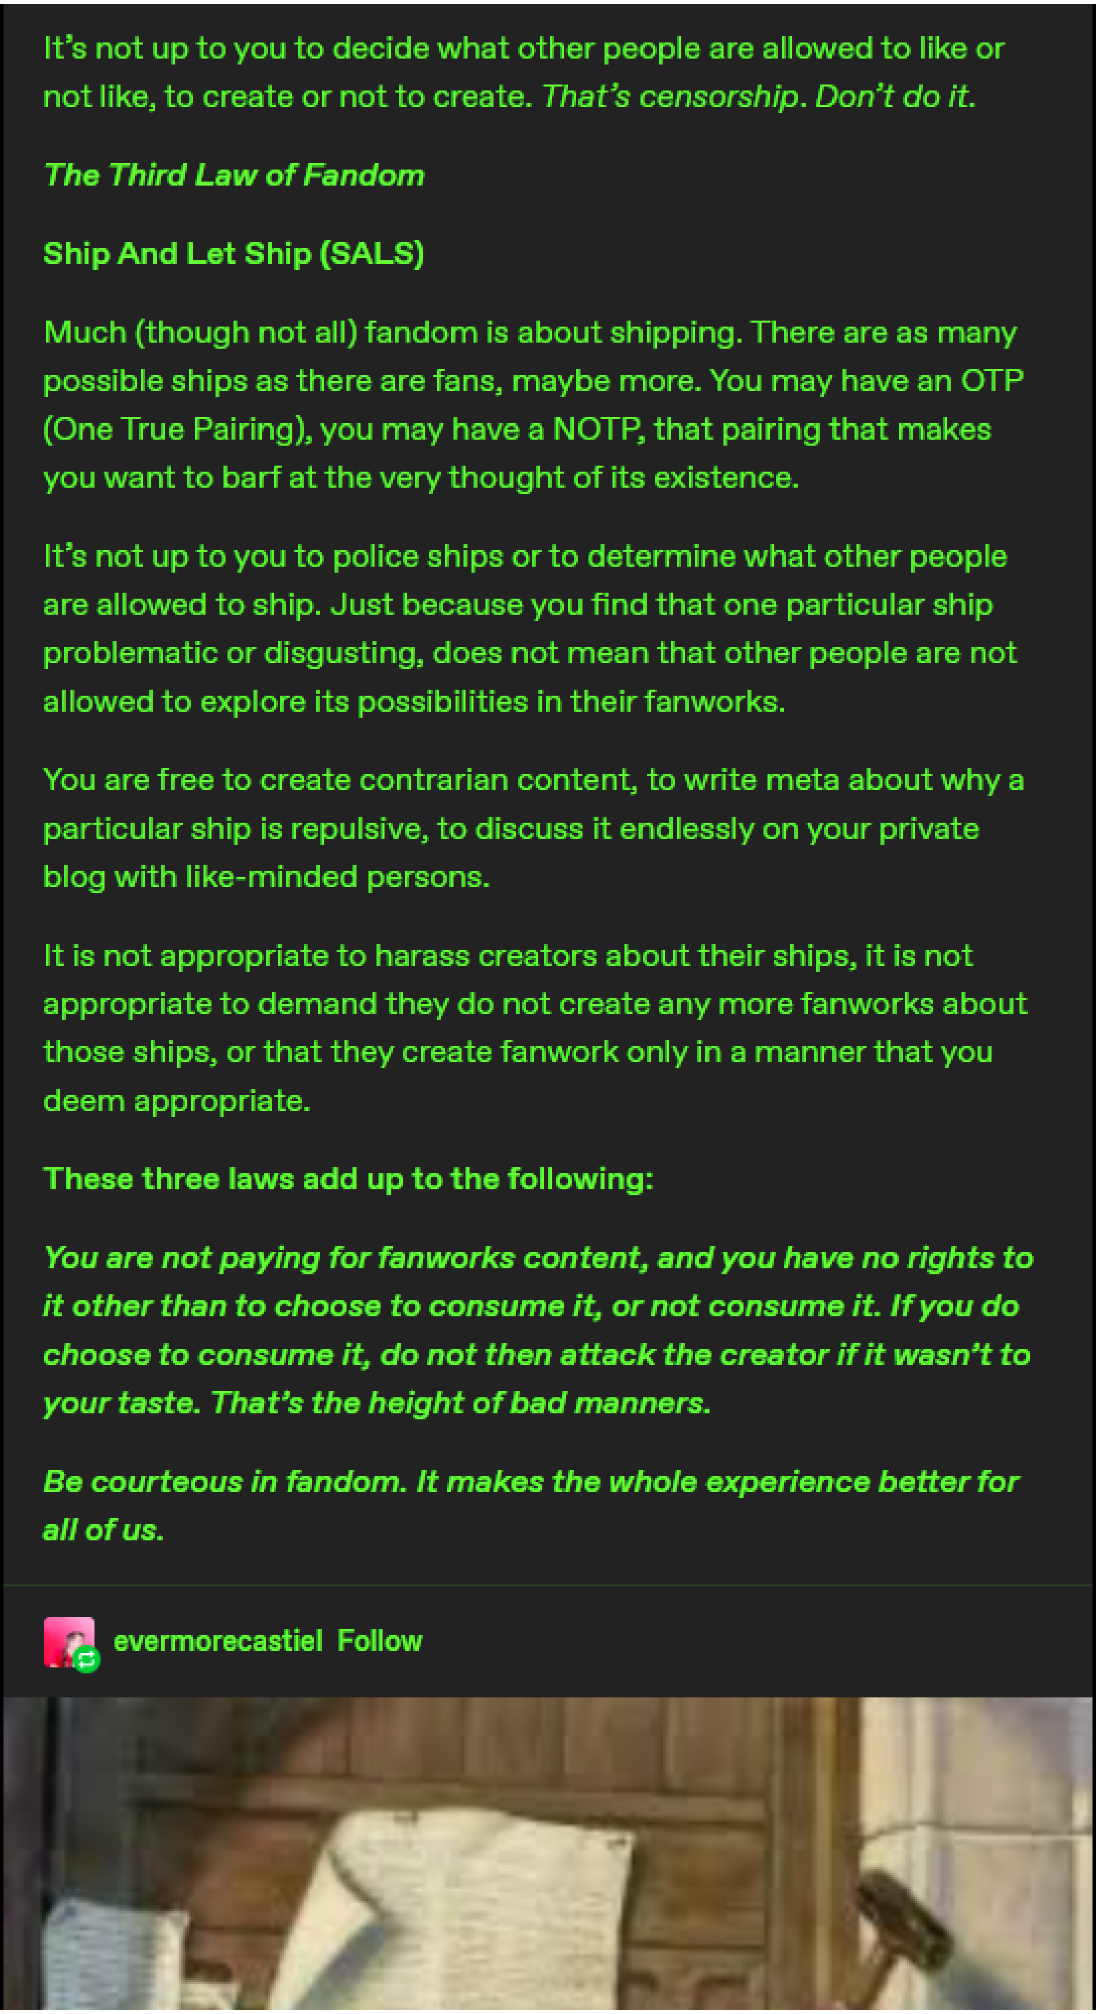
The Second Law of Fandom

Your Kink Is Not My Kink (YKINMK)

Simply put, this means that everyone likes different things. It's not up to you to determine what creators are allowed to create. It's not up to you to police fandom.

If you don't like something, you can post meta about it or create contrarian content yourself, seek to convert other fans to your way of thinking.

But you have no right to say to any creator "I do not like this, therefore you should not create it. Nobody should like this. It should not exist."



It’s not up to you to decide what other people are allowed to like or not like, to create or not to create. That’s censorship. Don’t do it.

The Third Law of Fandom

Ship And Let Ship (SALS)

Much (though not all) fandom is about shipping. There are as many possible ships as there are fans, maybe more. You may have an OTP (One True Pairing), you may have a NOTP, that pairing that makes you want to barf at the very thought of its existence.

It’s not up to you to police ships or to determine what other people are allowed to ship. Just because you find that one particular ship problematic or disgusting, does not mean that other people are not allowed to explore its possibilities in their fanworks.

You are free to create contrarian content, to write meta about why a particular ship is repulsive, to discuss it endlessly on your private blog with like-minded persons.

It is not appropriate to harass creators about their ships, it is not appropriate to demand they do not create any more fanworks about those ships, or that they create fanwork only in a manner that you deem appropriate.

These three laws add up to the following:

You are not paying for fanworks content, and you have no rights to it other than to choose to consume it, or not consume it. If you do choose to consume it, do not then attack the creator if it wasn’t to your taste. That’s the height of bad manners.

Be courteous in fandom. It makes the whole experience better for all of us.

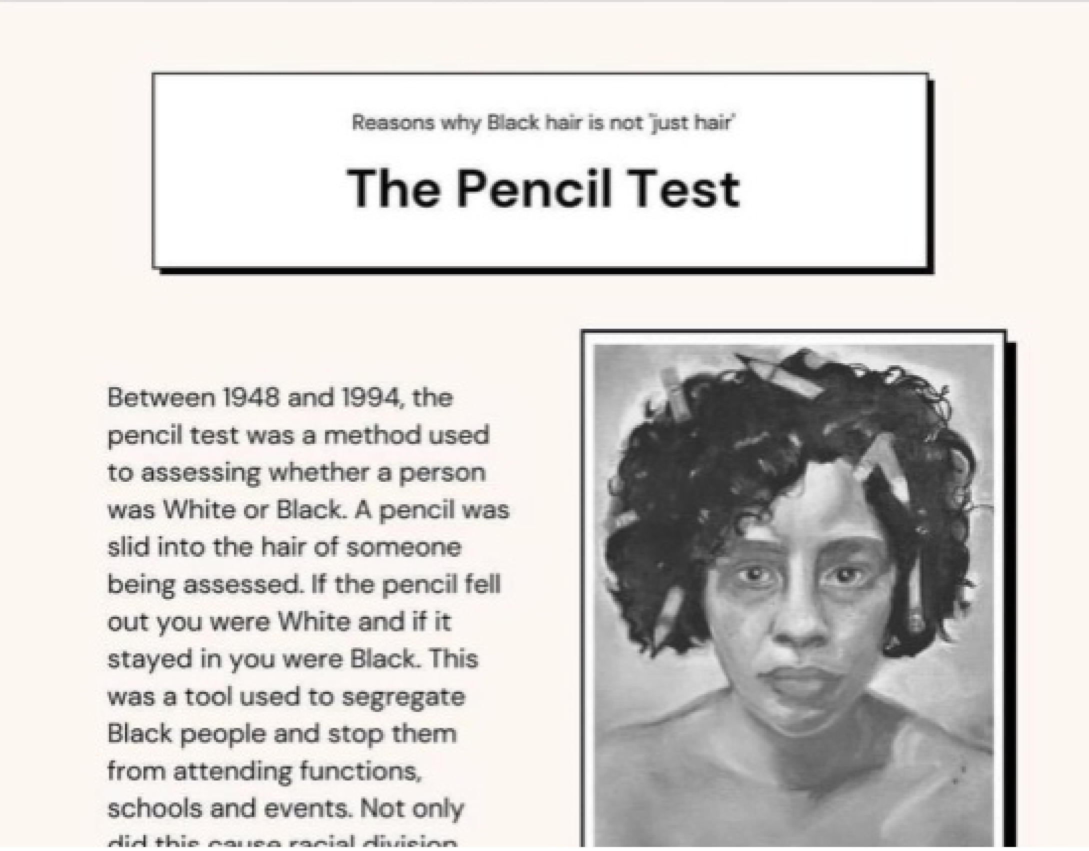
Reasons why Black hair is not just hair

@vibesofablackgirl



Reasons why Black hair is not 'just hair'

The Pencil Test

Between 1948 and 1994, the pencil test was a method used to assessing whether a person was White or Black. A pencil was slid into the hair of someone being assessed. If the pencil fell out you were White and if it stayed in you were Black. This was a tool used to segregate Black people and stop them from attending functions, schools and events. Not only did this cause racial division did this cause racial division it also tore families apart.

@vibesofablackgirl

Reasons why Black hair is not 'just hair'

Map to Freedom

Cornrows have a rich history in the Black community. Slaves would braid escape routes into their hair. They were used as a way for slaves to communicate with one another without their slave owners knowing. Some of the cornrows and the number of plaits worn would let them know how far they needed to travel or how many roads they needed to walk till they would be able to meet one another to escape the plantation.

@vibesofablackgirl

Reasons why Black hair is not 'just hair'

Means of Survival

The Black women who came before us were innovative and showed that the thickens and texture of Black hair was so valuable and had a purpose. This is because slaves would braid rice and seeds in their cornrows before journeying the Middle Passage. Enslaved mothers would also braid seeds in their children's hair so they could eat in case they were separated due to slave auctions.

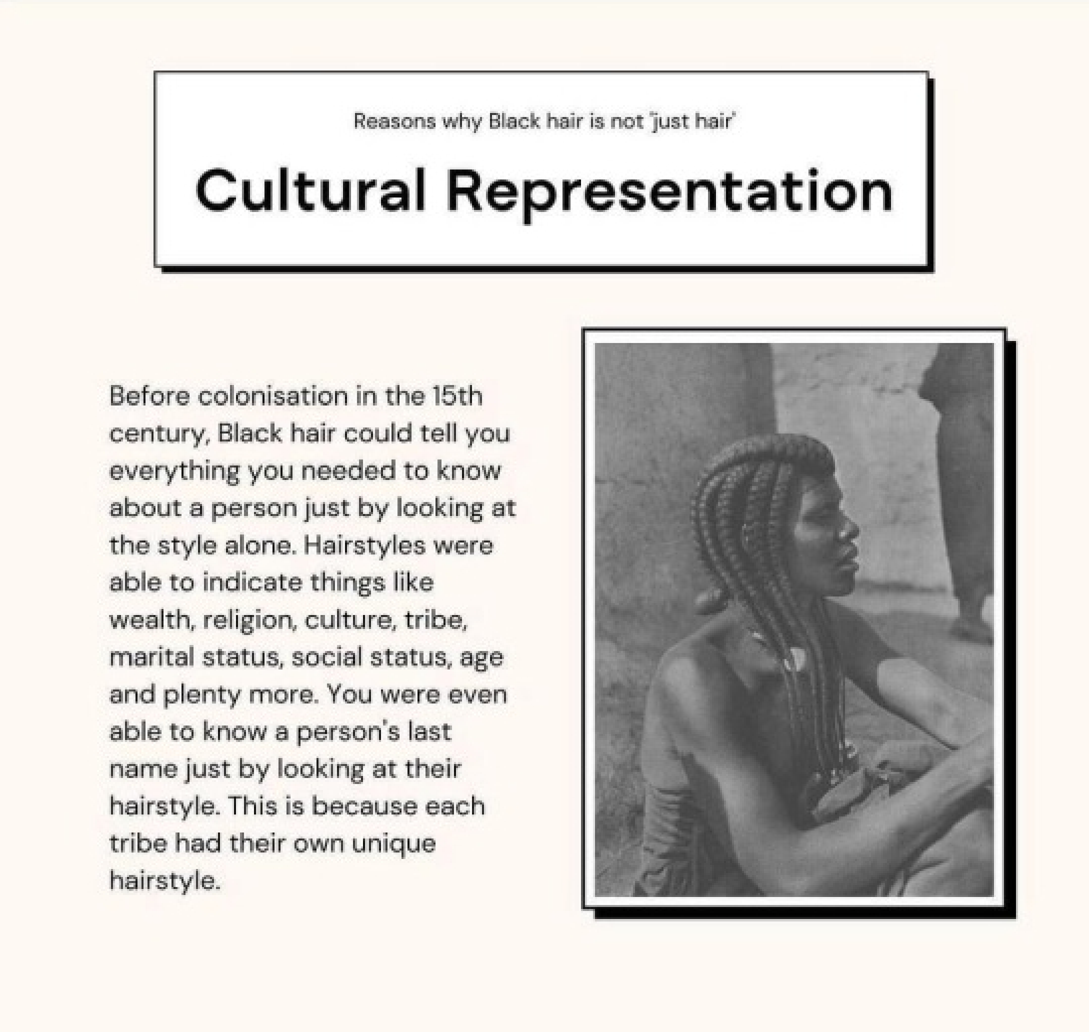
@vibesofablackgirl

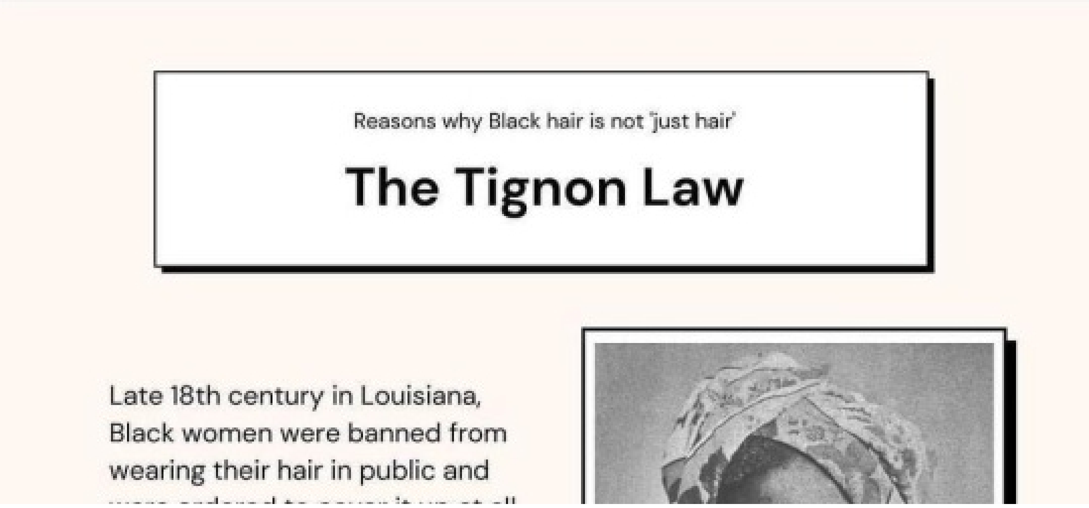


Reasons why Black hair is not 'just hair'

Cultural Representation

Before colonisation in the 15th century, Black hair could tell you everything you needed to know about a person just by looking at the style alone. Hairstyles were able to indicate things like wealth, religion, culture, tribe, marital status, social status, age and plenty more. You were even able to know a person's last name just by looking at their hairstyle. This is because each tribe had their own unique hairstyle.

@vibesofablackgirl



Reasons why Black hair is not 'just hair'

The Tignon Law

Late 18th century in Louisiana, Black women were banned from wearing their hair in public and were ordered to cover it up at all times. This was because they wanted to curb the growing influence of the free black population and keep the social order. It was also believed that Black women's hairstyles would draw the attention of white men, and this increased the jealousy of white women.

@vibesofablackgirl

Reasons why Black hair is not 'just hair'

Stripped of Identity

When the slave trade started and the slaves were captured, Black women were forced to shave all their hair off. This was the beginning process of eradicating the 'Black' identity and culture. It was also a tool used to minimise Black beauty and dehumanise Black women, as slave owners knew their hair was something they valued enormously, was part of their identity and it also held so much significance.

@vibesofablackgirl

Cultural Appropriation

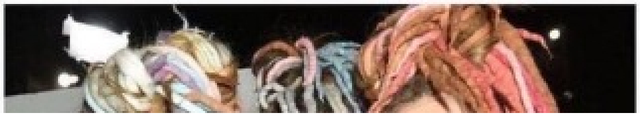


IMAGE SOURCE: BACKSTAGE AT MARC JACOBS SS17COURTESY OF MARC JACOBS VIA DAZEDDIGITAL.COM

Black hairstyles are an outward expression of self-acceptance and self-love. However, the anti-Black hair sentiment has existed in society for centuries. Black hair has been compared to wool and often described as 'wild', 'nappy' or 'ghetto'. Yet non-Black people are praised, credited and even profit from styles and trends that Black women have been ridiculed for. Cultural appreciation is about recognising the history and where it came from, which includes learning about and giving credit to what you're borrowing, instead of saying 'it's just hair'.

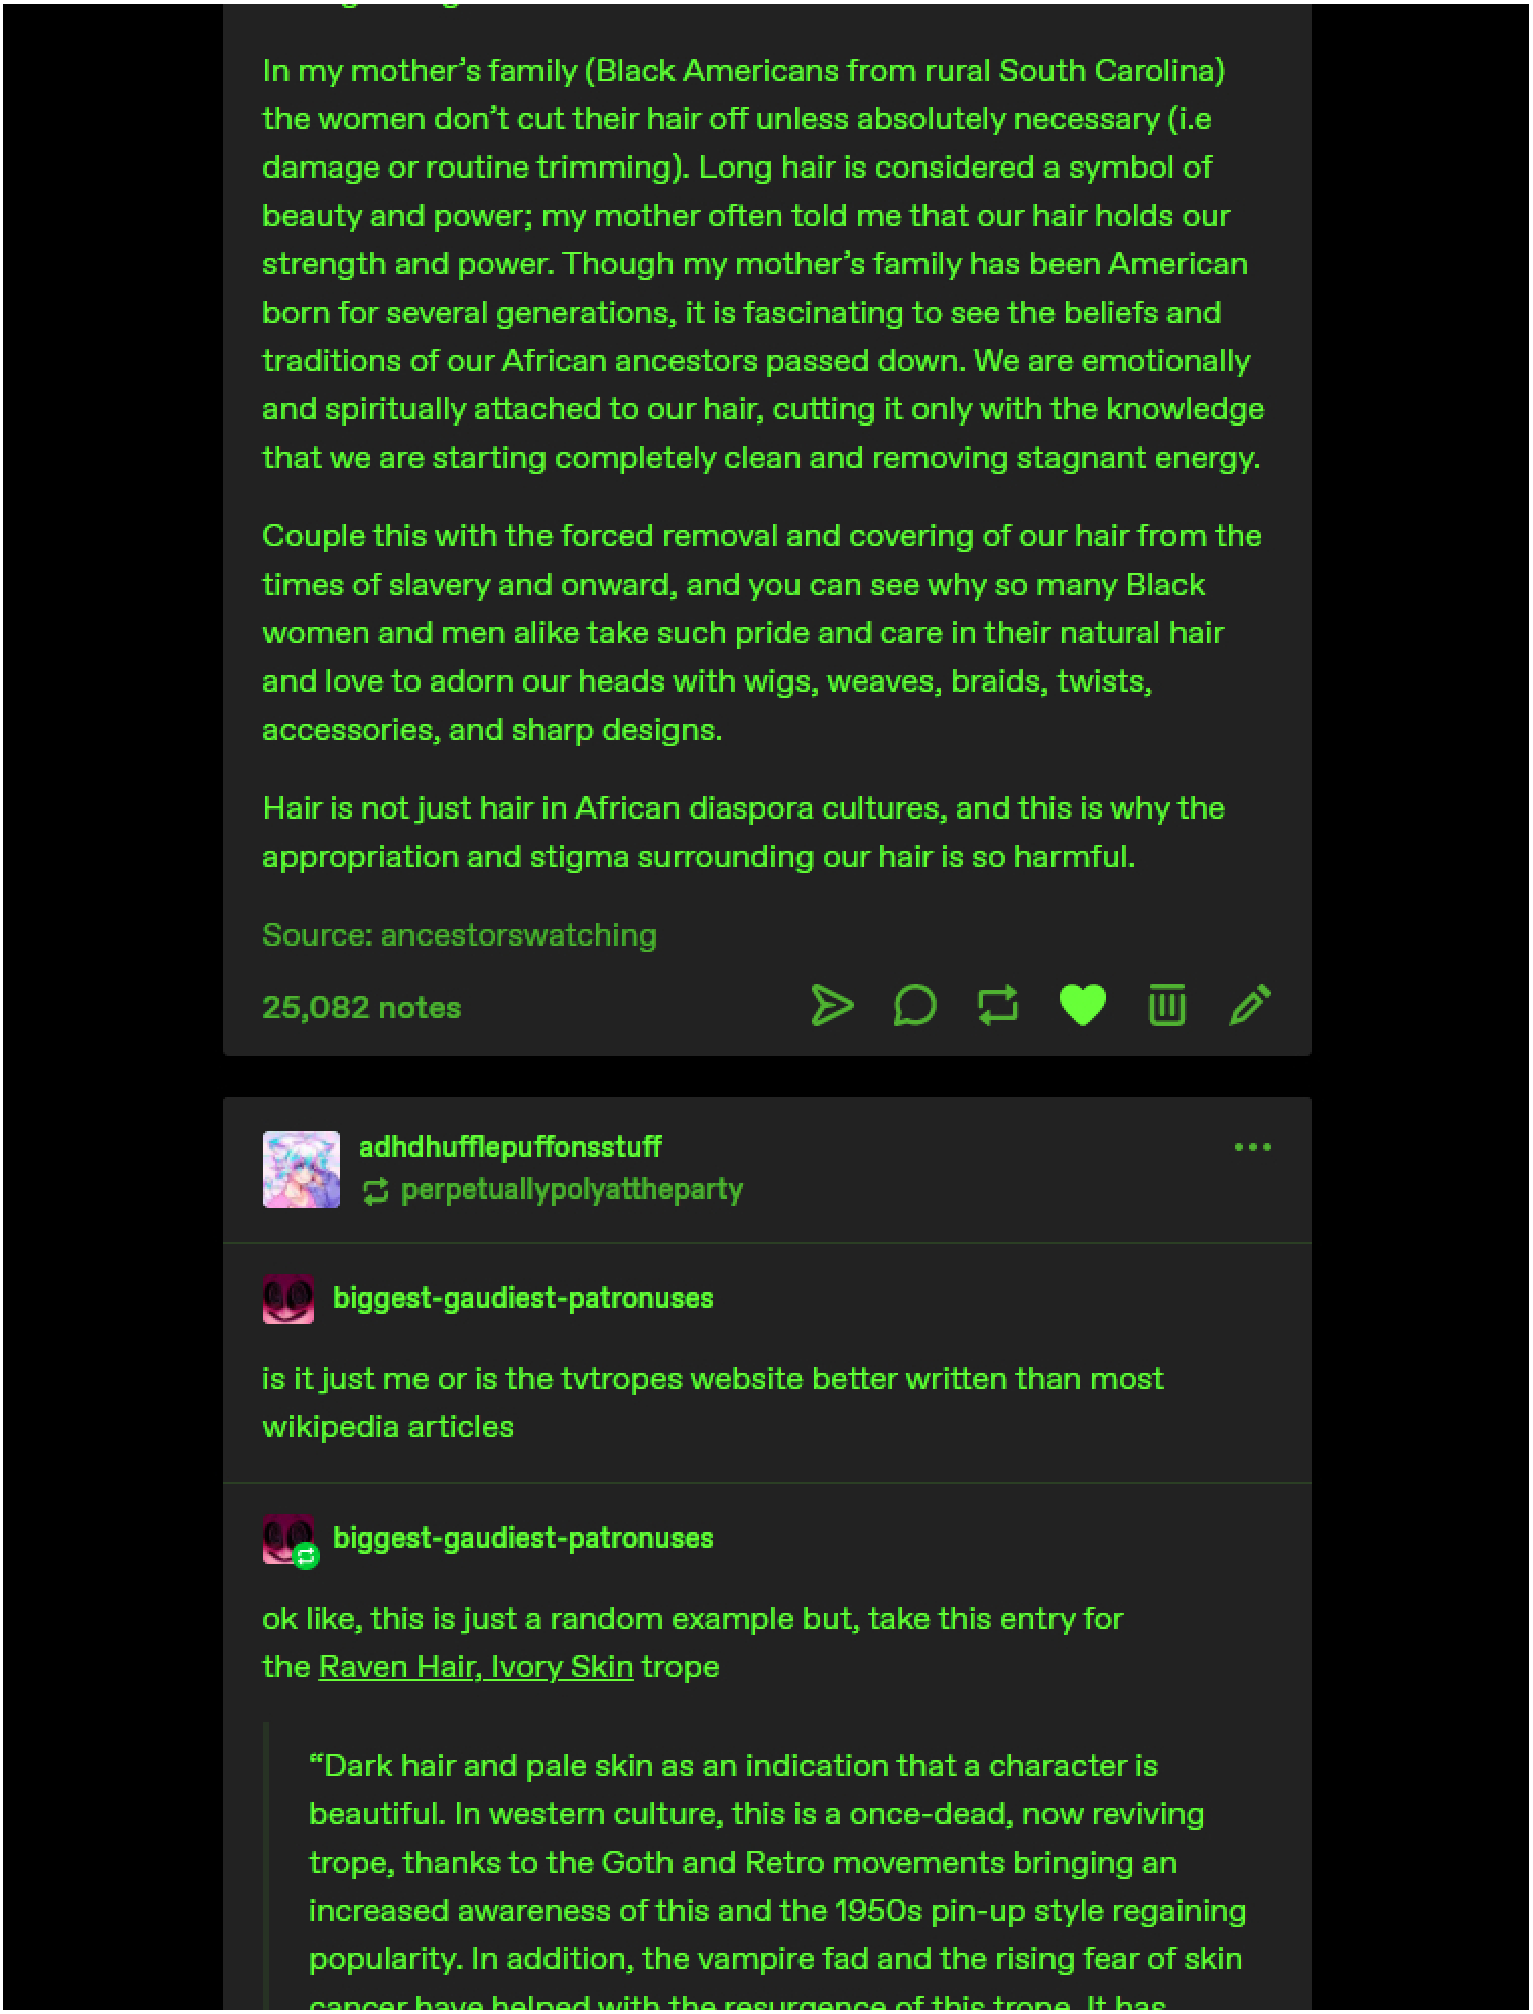
In many cultures, ethnic groups, and nations around the world, hair is considered a source of power and prestige. African people brought these traditions and beliefs to the Americas and passed them down through the generations.



In my mother's family (Black Americans from rural South Carolina) the women don't cut their hair off unless absolutely necessary (i.e damage or routine trimming). Long hair is considered a symbol of beauty and power; my mother often told me that our hair holds our strength and power. Though my mother's family has been American born for several generations, it is fascinating to see the beliefs and traditions of our African ancestors passed down. We are emotionally and spiritually attached to our hair, cutting it only with the knowledge that we are starting completely clean and removing stagnant energy.

Couple this with the forced removal and covering of our hair from the times of slavery and onward, and you can see why so many Black women and men alike take such pride and care in their natural hair and love to adorn our heads with wigs, weaves, braids, twists, accessories, and sharp designs.

Hair is not just hair in African diaspora cultures, and this is why the appropriation and stigma surrounding our hair is so harmful.

ok like, this is just a random example but, take this entry for the Raven Hair, Ivory Skin trope

> "Dark hair and pale skin as an indication that a character is beautiful. In western culture, this is a once-dead, now reviving trope, thanks to the Goth and Retro movements bringing an increased awareness of this and the 1950s pin-up style regaining popularity. In addition, the vampire fad and the rising fear of skin cancer have helped with the resurgence of this trope. It has > cancer have helped with the resurgence of this trope. It has started to fade away again with the tanned and bleached look making a comeback. This is also quite popular in Eastern media, being the traditional standard of Asian beauty, and the fact that most of the population has black or very dark brown hair helps. The high contrast also makes for a striking and visually appealing appearance. Accents of pink or red, usually on the cheeks and lips, can also (eerily) heighten the appeal."

dk this is just…very readable and informative? concisely summarizes a bunch of relevant info on a trope i assumed i was totally familiar with? in the first paragraph alone i learn about the historic, gothic, retro, vampire, Asian, and aesthetic influences behind a trope i never thought of as interesting or significant. idk what i was expecting beyond "ebony hair, skin as white as snow" but this is…really well-written?

On the issue of the 'q slur'...

So, yesterday, I got into a rather stupid internet argument with someone who was peddling what seemed to me to be a rather insidious narrative about slur-reclamation. Someone in the ensuing notes raised a point which I thought was interesting, and worrying, and probably needed to be addressed in it's own post. So here we go:

> @penrosesun can you like. let people call slurs what they are. just because they tag it appropriately for people who don't want to see it doesn't mean they automatically hate you using it. dont respond with 'queer isnt a slur' to me if u see this just know that people are allowed to be uncomfortable with words that have been used to insult them

The word 'queer' itself seems to be especially touchy for many, so let me begin to address this by way of analogy.

Instead of talking about "queer", let's start by talking about "Jew" - a word which I believe is very similar in its usage in some significant ways.

Now, the word "Jew" has been used as a derogatory term for literally hundreds of years. It is used both as a noun (eg. "That guy ripped me off - what a dirty Jew") and as a verb (eg. "That guy really Jew-ed me"). These usages are deeply, fundamentally, horrifically offensive, and should be used under no circumstances, ever. And yet, I myself and should be used under no circumstances, ever. And yet, I myself have heard both, even as recently as this past year, even in an urban location with plenty of Jews, in a social situation where people should have known better. In short – the word "Jew", as it is used by certain antisemites, is – quite unambiguously – a slur. Not a dead slur, not a former slur – and active, living slur that most Jews will at some point in their life encounter in a context where the term is being used to denigrate them and their religion.

Now here's the thing, though: I'm a Jew. I call myself a Jew. I prefer that all non-Jews call me a Jew – so do most Jews I know. "Jew" is the correct term for someone who is part of the religion of Judaism, the same way that "Muslim" is the correct term for someone who is part of the religion of Islam, and "Christian" is the correct term for someone who is part of the religion of Christianity.

In fact, almost all of the terms that non-Jews use to avoid saying "Jew" (eg. "a member of the Jewish persuasion", "a follower of the Jewish faith", "coming from a Jewish family", "identifying as part of the Jewish religion", etc) are deeply offensive, because these terms imply to us that the speaker sees the term "Jew" (and by extension, what that term stands for) as a dirty word.

"BUT WAIT" – I hear you say – "didn't you just say that Jew is used as a slur?!?"

Yes. Yes, I did. And also, it is fundamentally offensive not to call us that, because it is our name and our identity.

Let me back up a little bit, and bring you into the world of one of those 2000s PSAs about not using "that's so gay". Think of some word that is your identity – something which you consider to be a fundamental and intrinsic part of yourself. It could be "female" or "male", or "Black" or "white", "tall" or "short", "Atheist" or "Mormon" or "Evangelical" – you name it.

Now imagine that people started using that term as a slur.

"What a female thing to do!" they might say. "That teacher doesn't know anything, he's so female!"

Or maybe, "Yikes, look at that idiot who's driving like an atheist. It's so embarrassing!"

Or perhaps, "Oh gross, that music is so Black, turn it off!"

Now, what would you say if the same groups of people who had been saying those things for years turned around and avoided using those words to describe anything other than an insult?

“Oh, so I see you’re a member of the female persuasion!”

“Is he… a follower of the atheist beliefs? Like does he identify as part of the community of atheist-aligned individuals?”

“So, as a Black-ish identified person yourself – excuse me, as a person who comes from a Black-ish family…”

Here’s the fundamental problem with treating all words that are used as slurs the same, without any regard for how they are used and how they developed – not all slurs are the same.

No one, and I mean no one (except maybe for a small handful of angsty teens who are deliberately making a point of being edgy) self-identifies as a kike. In contrast, essentially all Jews self-identify as Jews. And when non-Jews get weird about that identity on the grounds that “Jew is used as a slur”, despite the fact that it is the name that the Jewish community as a whole resoundingly identifies with, what they are basically saying is that they think that the slur usage is more important than the Jewish community self-identification usage. They are saying, in essence, “we think that your name should be a slur.”

Now, at the top I said that the word “Jew” and the word “queer” had some significant similarities in terms of their usage, and I think that’s pretty apparent if you look at what people in those communities are saying about those terms. When American Jews were being actively threatened by neo-Nazis in the 70s, the slogan of choice was “For every Jew a .22!”. When the American Queer community was marching in the 90s in protest of systemic anti-queer violence, the slogan of choice was “We’re here, we’re queer, get used to it!” Clearly, these are terms that are used by the communities themselves, in reference to themselves. Clearly, these terms are more than simply slurs.

But while there are useful similarities between how the terms “Jew” and “Queer” are used by bigots and by their own communities, I’d also like to point out that there is pretty substantial and important difference:

Unlike for “queer”, there is no organized group of Jewish antisemites who are using the catchphrase “Jew is a slur!” in order to selectively silence and disenfranchise Jews who are part of minority groups within Judaism.

This is the real rub with the term queer – no one was campaigning about it being a slur until less than a decade ago. No one was saying that you needed to warn for the word queer when queer people were establishing the academic discipline of queer studies. No one was ‘think of the children”-ing the umbrella term when queer activists were literally marching for their lives. Go back to even 2010 and the term “q slur” would have been basically unparseable – if I saw someone tag something “q slur”, like most queer people I would have wracked my brains trying to figure out what slur even started with q, and if I learned that it was supposed to be “queer”, my default assumption would be that the post was made by a well-meaning but extremely clueless straight person.

I literally remember this shift – and I remember who started it. Exclusionists didn’t like the fact that queer was an umbrella term. Terfs (or radfems as they like to be called now) didn’t like that queer history included trans history; biphobes and aphobes didn’t like that the queer community was also a community to bisexuals and asexuals. And so what could they possibly say, to drive people away from the term that was protecting the sorts of queer people that they wanted to exclude?

Well, naturally, they turned to “queer is a slur.”

And here’s the thing – queer is a slur, just like Jew is a slur, and no one is denying that. And that fact makes “queer is a slur so don’t use it” a very convincing argument on the surface: 1) queer is still often used as a slur, and 2) you shouldn’t ever use slurs without carefully tagging and warning people about them (and better yet, you should never use them at all), and so therefore 3) you need to tag for “the q slur” and you need to warn people not to call the community “the queer community” or it’s members “queer people” or its study “queer studies” – because it’s a slur!

But the crucial step that’s missing here is exactly the same one above, for the word “Jew” – and that step is that not all slurs are the same. When a term is both used as a slur and used as a self-identity term, then favoring the slur meaning instead of the identity meaning is picking the side of the slur-users over the disadvantaged group!

is picking the side of the slur-users over the disadvantaged group!

If you say or tag "q slur" you are sending the message, whether you realize it or not, that people who use "queer" as a slur are more right about its meaning than those who use it as their identity. Tagging for "queer" is one thing. People can filter for "queer" if it triggers them, just like people can filter for anything else. Not everyone has to personally use the term queer, or like the term queer. But there is no circumstance where the term "q slur" does not indicate that you think queer is more of a slur than of an accurate description of a community.

If I, as a Jew, ever came across a post where someone had warned for innocent, positive, non-antisemitic content relating to Judaism with the tag "J slur", I would be incensed. So would any Jew. The act of tagging a post "J slur" is in and of itself antisemitic and offensive.

Queer people are allowed to feel the same about "q slur". It is not a neutral warning term – it is an attack on our identity.

This is actually dangerous and neglectful bad parenting.

Babies cannot stop eating, so the risk of overeating and vomiting is much higher for them, even when closely monitored (when I was a baby even if my mom fed me for 10 minutes it was too much and I would vomit as a result). This baby will keep eating until they vomit, and she is on her back with a bottle in her mouth, so she can't even vomit properly and will run a much higher risk of asphyxiating.

If my spouse did this I would seriously reconsider the marriage. And I wouldn't leave them alone with the baby or any babies after them (actually I wouldn't have any more children with them unless it was adopting an older child that did not need help eating) until they were old enough to communicate their needs and had the ability to eat unassisted (so basically elementary school).

Don't do this. You are putting your child at risk.

Bottle feeding infants have no choice but to swallow to protect their airways. Bottles drip, sucking is a reflex. And they have no choice but to swallow the formula milk, and then there's more.

A newborn or young infant can be forced to drink far more than their tiny stomach can hold. Cue the puking.

Never prop bottles. Pay attention to baby's cues. Look up paced bottle feeding. Respect natural feeding rhythms.

It's why medical professionals now recommend paced feeding (to prevent over feeding, vomiting and in the case of combination feeding - breast refusal).

http://www.peelregion.ca/parenting/feeding-baby/paced.asp

Paced bottle feeding - parenting - Region of Peel

Paced bottle feeding - parenting - Region of Peel

PEELREGION.CA

I should note, generally breastfed babies have more control. They have to be latched and suckling to trigger the milk ejection reflex. In cases of oversupply (yes this is a thing, I had it) babies will release the breast spluttering and choking and often clamp down to stop the flow (as painful as it sounds).

fieldbears Follow

Related risk: Leaving a bottle unattended in a baby's mouth for long enough can give the infant 'bottle mouth' if they have even the beginnings of cut teeth. Do Not Do This.

jenroses Follow

As a longtime parenting educator, can confirm, do not ever.

star-anise Follow

Also, a lot of the health benefits of breastfeeding aren't actually about the milk—they're about the positive physical and emotional effects of skin-to-skin contact. Babies need physical touch, and lots of it, for their autonomic nervous system to release the hormones that allow them to grow and thrive.

Being held by another human and soothed by the rhythm of their breath, heartbeat, and movement is essential to creating future emotional stability and mental health. It isn't important to be The Mother or even the one who's lactating to provide that kind of closeness—you just have to put in the work and hold the damn baby.

Boys almost never get taught the basics of childcare the way girls do, and we think it's adorable when men don't know what they're doing with their infant children. But it's harmful to the babies, robs those men of positive relationships with their kids, and is preventable with education.

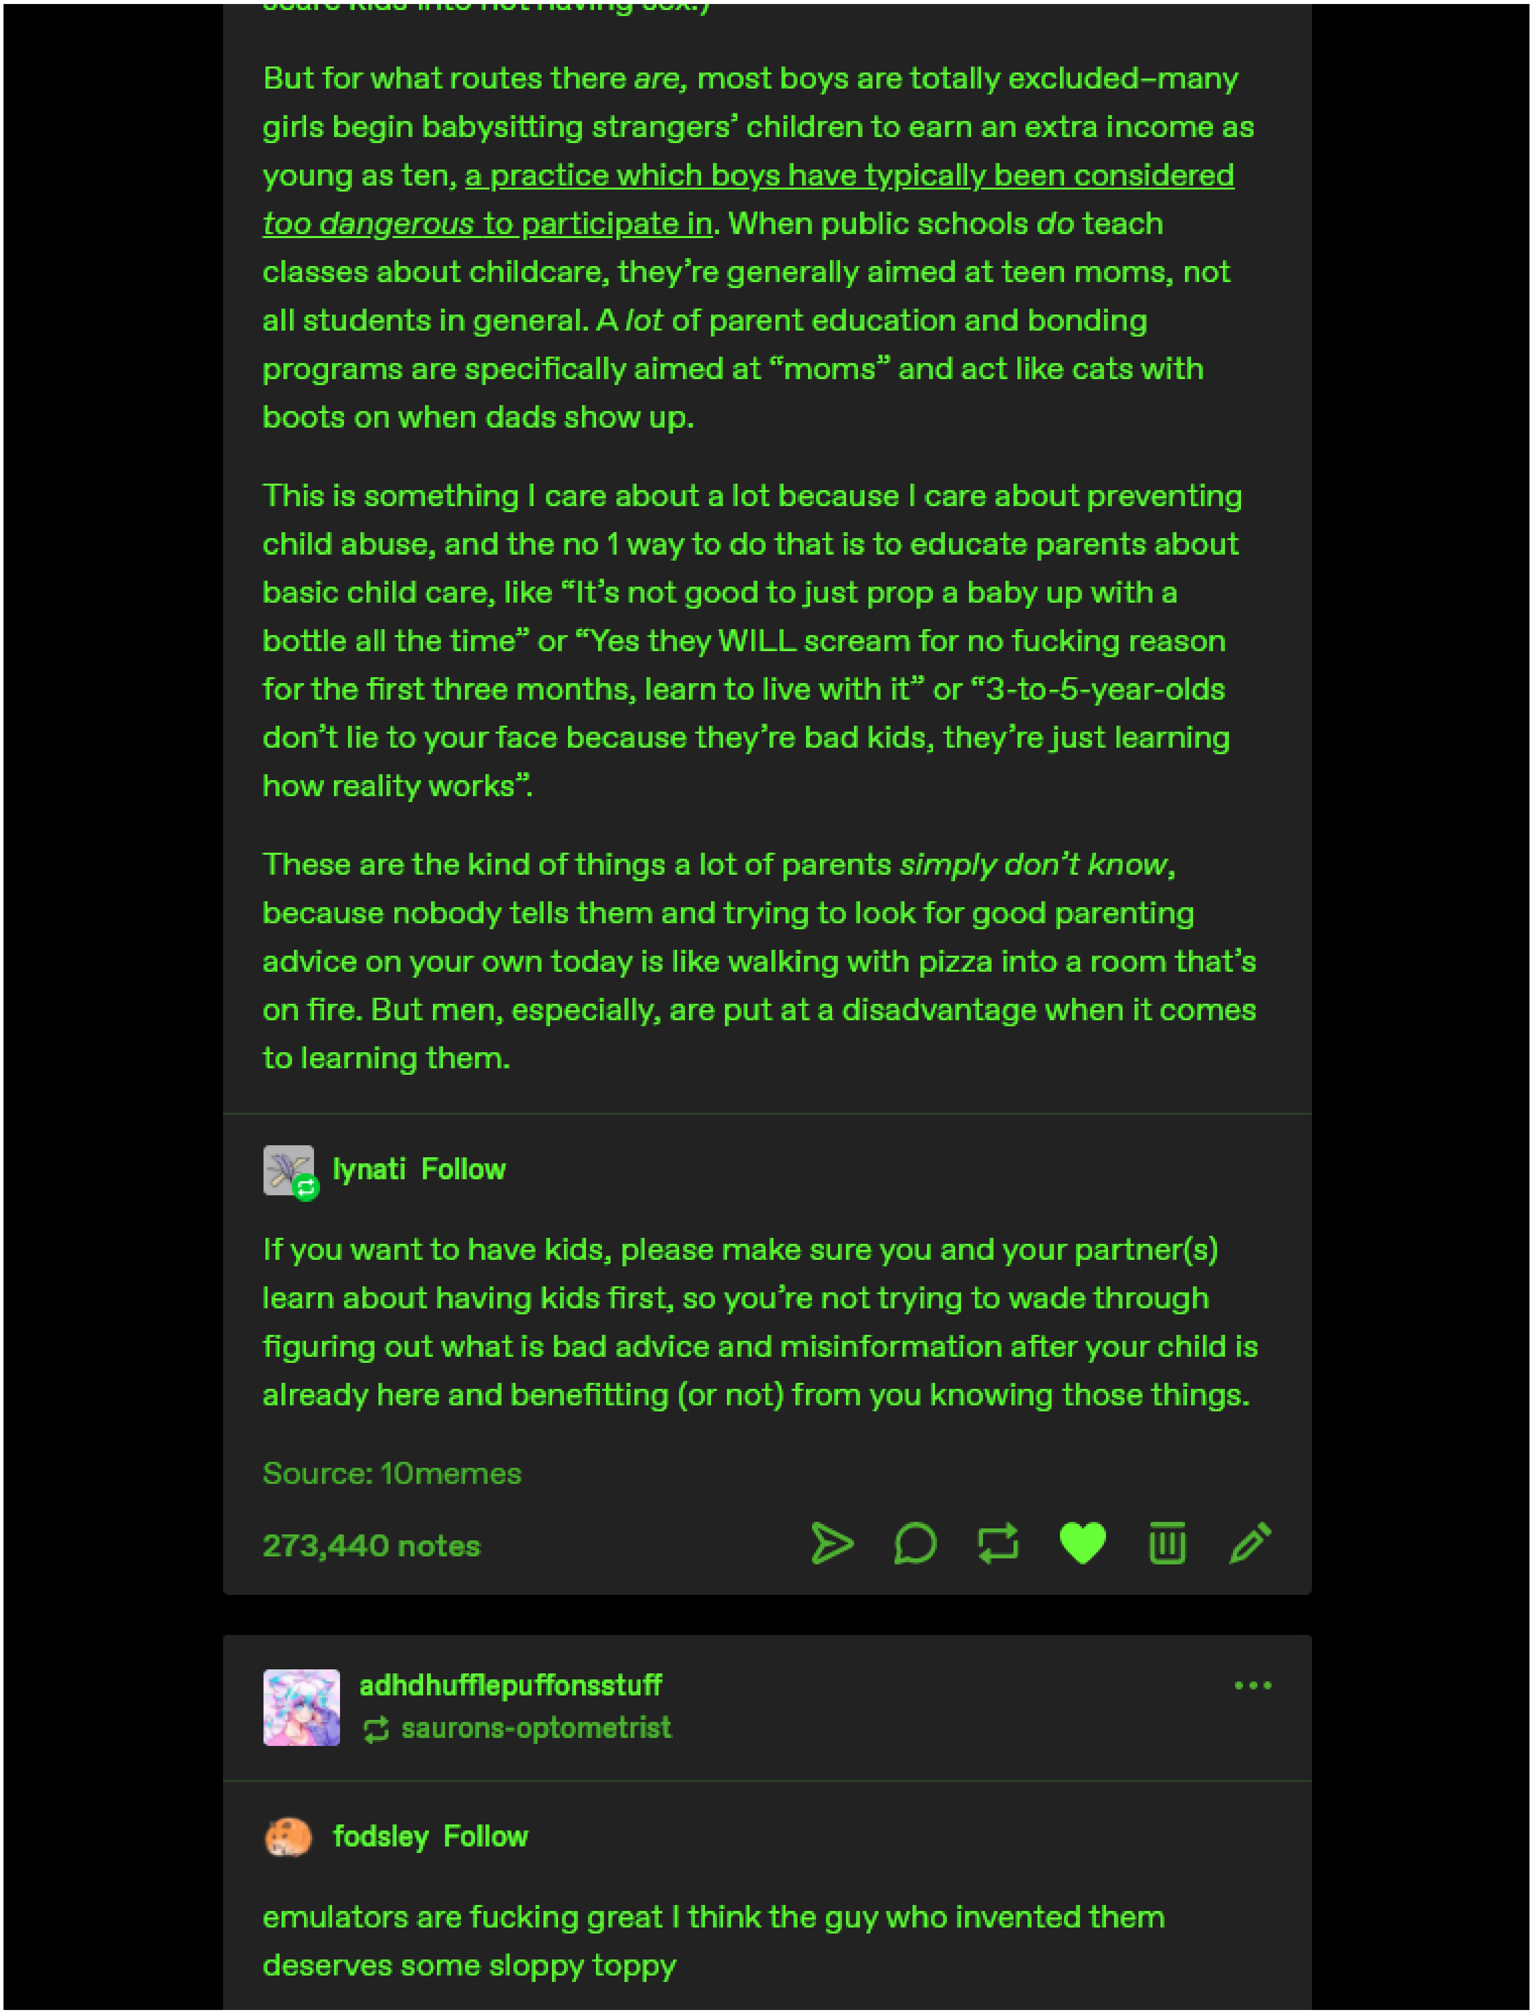
oodlenoodleroodle Follow

(I'm AFAB and was never taught anything about babies either.)

star-anise Follow

I mean, most people aren't. We have a general cultural illiteracy about early childhood development. It's incredibly rare to find, for example, jurisdictions where public schools offer courses in childcare the same way they might offer Spanish or Art. You're just supposed to "pick it up" (usually by being a young woman in a family with babies and getting tasked with childcare, which is happening less and less these days).

(And when schools say they're teaching "what it's like to be a parent" they're usually not teaching useful parenting skills, just trying to scare kids into not having sex.)



scare kids into not having sex.)

But for what routes there are, most boys are totally excluded–many girls begin babysitting strangers' children to earn an extra income as young as ten, a practice which boys have typically been considered too dangerous to participate in. When public schools do teach classes about childcare, they're generally aimed at teen moms, not all students in general. A lot of parent education and bonding programs are specifically aimed at "moms" and act like cats with boots on when dads show up.

This is something I care about a lot because I care about preventing child abuse, and the no 1 way to do that is to educate parents about basic child care, like "It's not good to just prop a baby up with a bottle all the time" or "Yes they WILL scream for no fucking reason for the first three months, learn to live with it" or "3-to-5-year-olds don't lie to your face because they're bad kids, they're just learning how reality works".

These are the kind of things a lot of parents simply don't know, because nobody tells them and trying to look for good parenting advice on your own today is like walking with pizza into a room that's on fire. But men, especially, are put at a disadvantage when it comes to learning them.

lynati Follow

If you want to have kids, please make sure you and your partner(s) learn about having kids first, so you're not trying to wade through figuring out what is bad advice and misinformation after your child is already here and benefitting (or not) from you knowing those things.

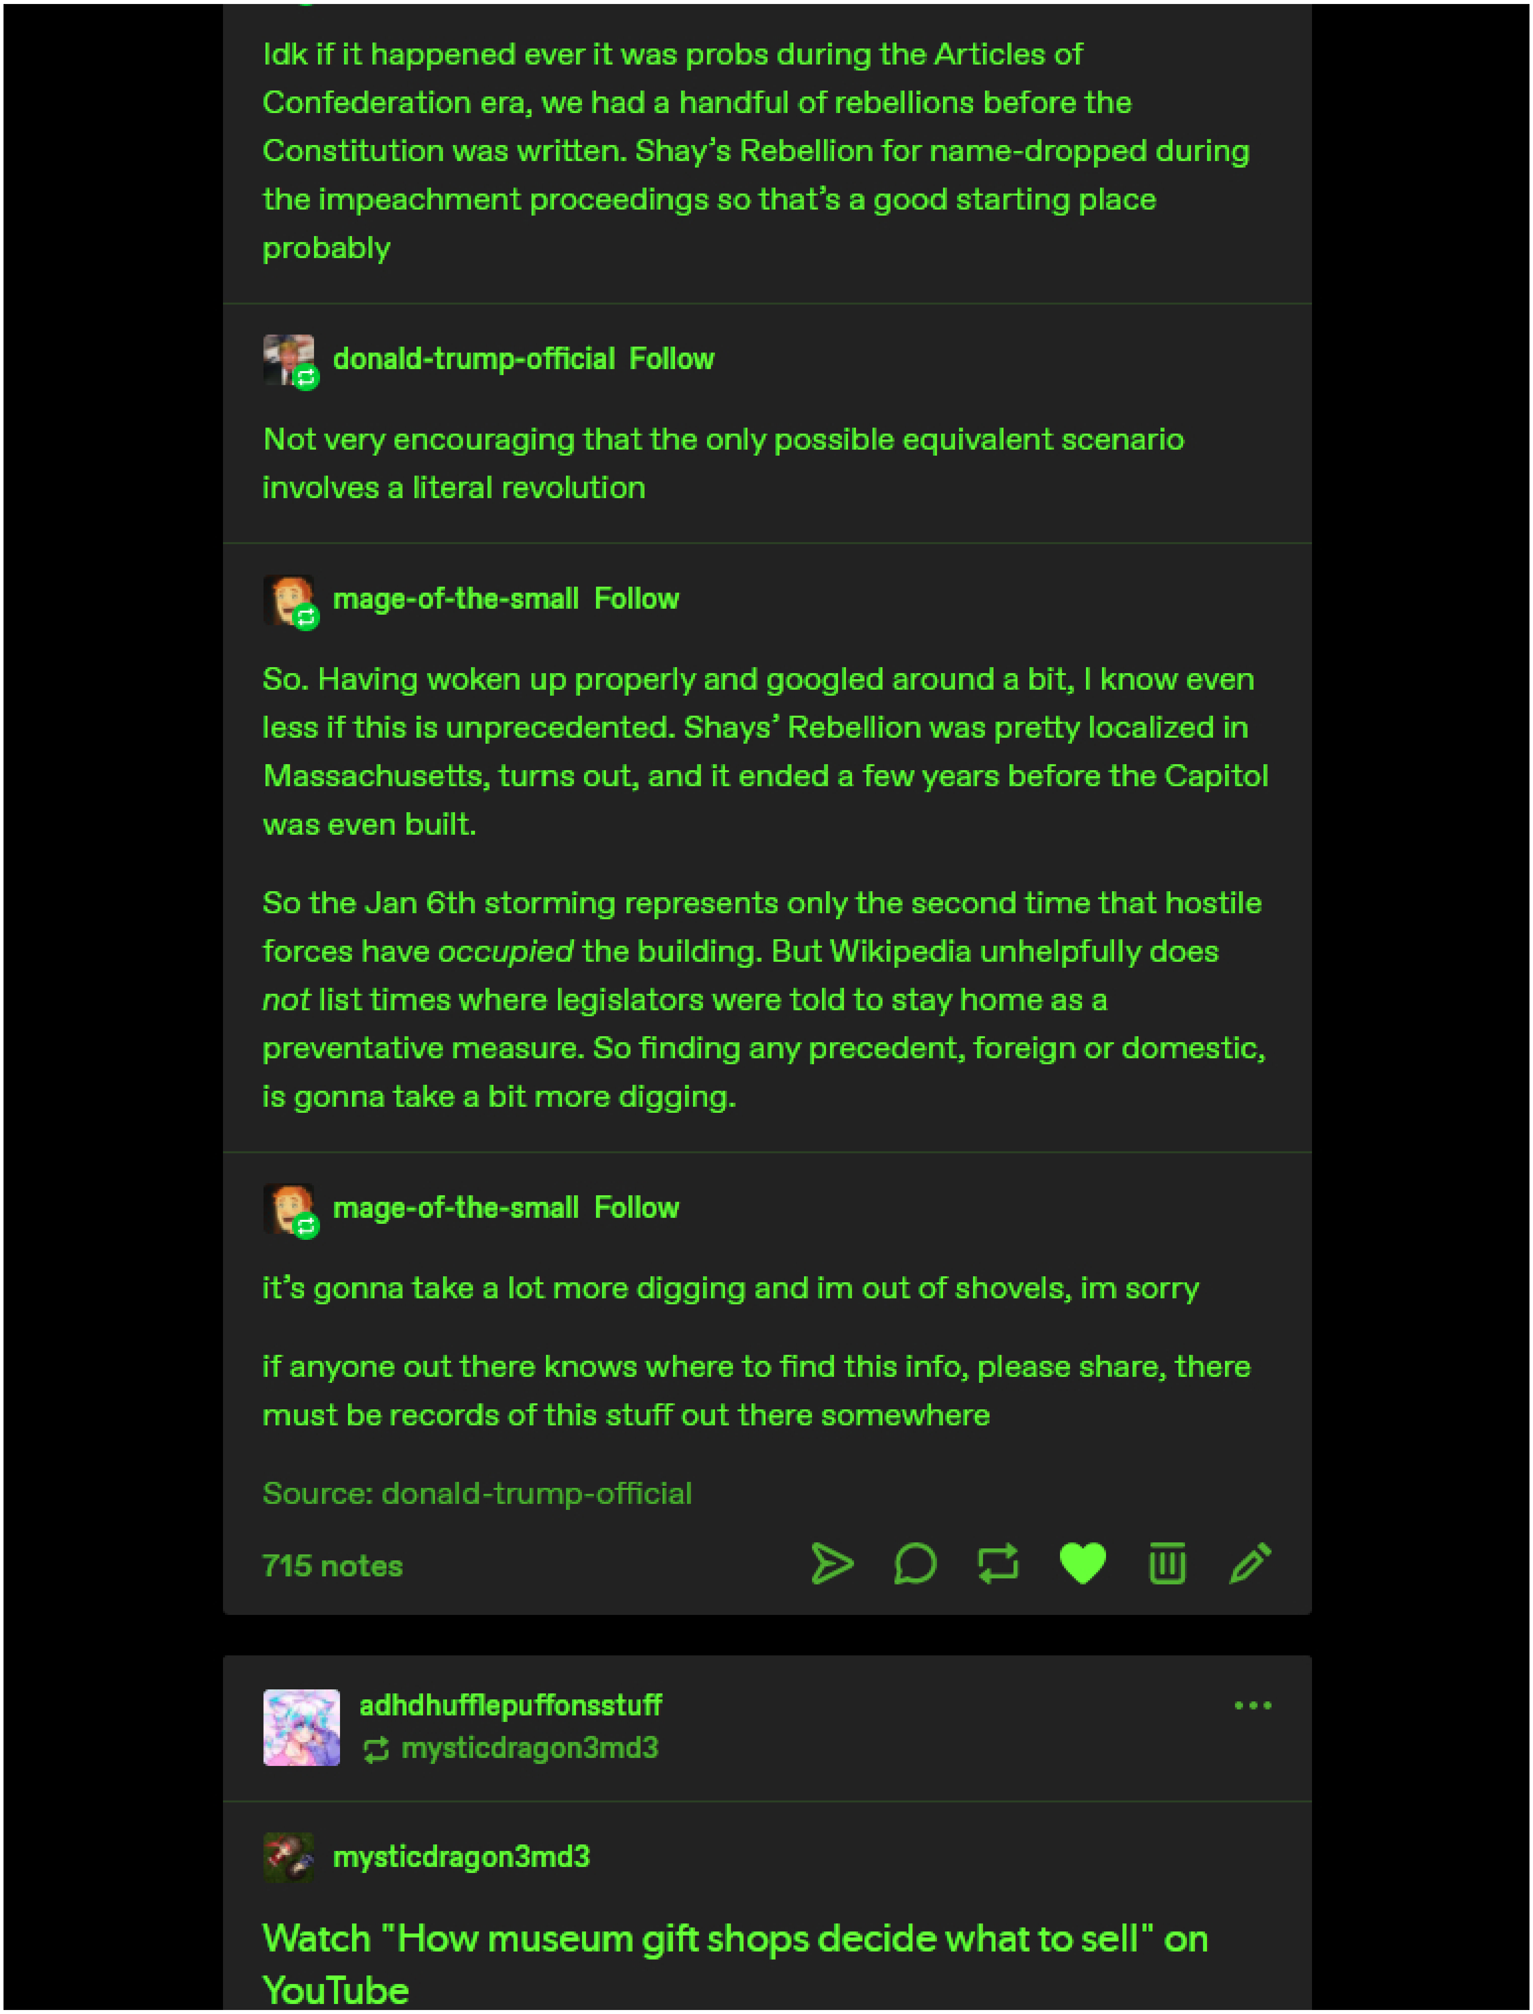
Can anybody point me towards any other time in American history when congress had to cancel a day of work due to domestic terrorists threatening to invade/attack the United States Capitol building? Is this unprecedented?

mage-of-the-small Follow



Idk if it happened ever it was probs during the Articles of Confederation era, we had a handful of rebellions before the Constitution was written. Shay's Rebellion for name-dropped during the impeachment proceedings so that's a good starting place probably donald-trump-official Follow

Not very encouraging that the only possible equivalent scenario involves a literal revolution

mage-of-the-small Follow

So. Having woken up properly and googled around a bit, I know even less if this is unprecedented. Shays' Rebellion was pretty localized in Massachusetts, turns out, and it ended a few years before the Capitol was even built.

So the Jan 6th storming represents only the second time that hostile forces have occupied the building. But Wikipedia unhelpfully does not list times where legislators were told to stay home as a preventative measure. So finding any precedent, foreign or domestic, is gonna take a bit more digging.

It's high key illegal to make any kind of nazi joke or gesture in Germany. People can get fired for it and in extreme cases even arrested. On my class trip to Berlin this kid thought it'd be funny to do a Nazi salute in the parking lot where hitler died (was not a destination, just happened to walk by). He was immediately pulled aside by police who legit booked him a flight home for the next day, without the rest of us. He was suspended for two weeks too.

Funny how the country responsible for this takes full responsibility and fights to make it never happen again, while the US, who spent years basing an entire identity on fighting Nazis, gives them a platform to speak freely and draft members.

fandomsandfeminism

fandomsandfeminism

One thing about fandom culture is that it sort of trains you to interact with and analyze media in a very specific way. Not a BAD way, just a SPECIFIC way.

And the kind of media that attracts fandoms lends itself well (normally) to those kinds of analysis. Mainly, you're supposed to LIKE and AGREE with the main characters. Themes are built around agreeing with the protagonists and condemning the antagonists, and taking the protagonists at their word.

Which is fine if you're looking at, like, 99% of popular anime and YA fiction and Marvel movies.

But it can completely fall apart with certain kinds of media. If someone who has only ever analyzed media this way is all of a sudden handed Lolita or 1984 or Gatsby, which deal in shitty unreliable narrators; or even books like Beloved or Catcher in the Rye (VERY different books) that have narrators dealing with and reacting to challenging situations- well... that's how you get some hilariously bad literary analysis.

I dont know what my point here is, really, except...like...I find it very funny when people are like "ugh. I hate Gatsby and Catcher because all the characters are shitty" which like....isnt....the point. Lololol you arent supposed to kin Gatsby.

operahousebookworm

I ran into this in high school when we read All the King's Men. Several of my classmates were all "I don't like it because Willie is a bad man, it should have been more about the narrator" and I was in my corner like "but he's INTERESTING and TRAGIC and the narrator is a DISHTOWEL"

fandomsandfeminism

inklingofadream reblogged your post

#literature #i mean sometimes i say they're all bad #and i mean it bc they're bad in a frustrating way #(i bring this up bc GATSBY SPECIFICALLY is a book i rlly dislike #bc the characters suck as ppl and like. for what? #they don't have pressures of any kind making them like that #they all just woke up like 'im gonna be the worst version of myself today') #fandom #meta

Because the book is a condemnation of the excess of the Jazz Age and mindless American consumption. That Gatsby yearns and yearns and yearns for more and more and more to the point of impossibility is what causes so much misery at the end. That even when Daisy agrees to be with him, to leave her husband for him, he DEMANDS that she say she never loved her husband because he wants not just her love NOW and in the future, but to retroactively claim her love in the past- and it destroys him.

All the characters suffer this to some degree- the wanting and desire for the unattainable that leaves Nick (who desires very very little) disgusted and disillusioned at the end.

It's why the green light is green and daisy's hair is gold- it's all wealth and status and the sisyphean yearning to possess everything that is so so toxic. And that's the point of the book- to point at all the wealth and excess of American consumption and denounce it.

Personally, I sympathize a lot with Daisy. That scene where she talks about her daughter and how the best thing a girl can hope for is to be a pretty fool? It's so sad, because Daisy IS pretty, but she isnt a fool and underneath the pretty dresses and nice house, she isnt happy either. She's treated like a possession to be owned and yearned after and she knows it.

Of course it's ok if you dont like the book. No one is obligated to like any book, but there is a REASON that these characters are the way they are.

I‘m sorry but, I have the feeling that we don’t talk enough about 2011 Loki, like back then when he still seemed and looked kinda innocent (or as innocent as he can be), like before he kinda tried to commit not-alive by falling in the void, and instead was tortured and mind controlled by Thanos? Am I the only one?

He‘s so cute I love him, I mean Loki is, and always will be, magnificent, handsome and much more, but I think in the first “Thor“ movie he was… yeah, cute and still kinda innocent so,

Let‘s say this is kind of a “2011-Loki-appreciation-post“ 🙃🐍💚

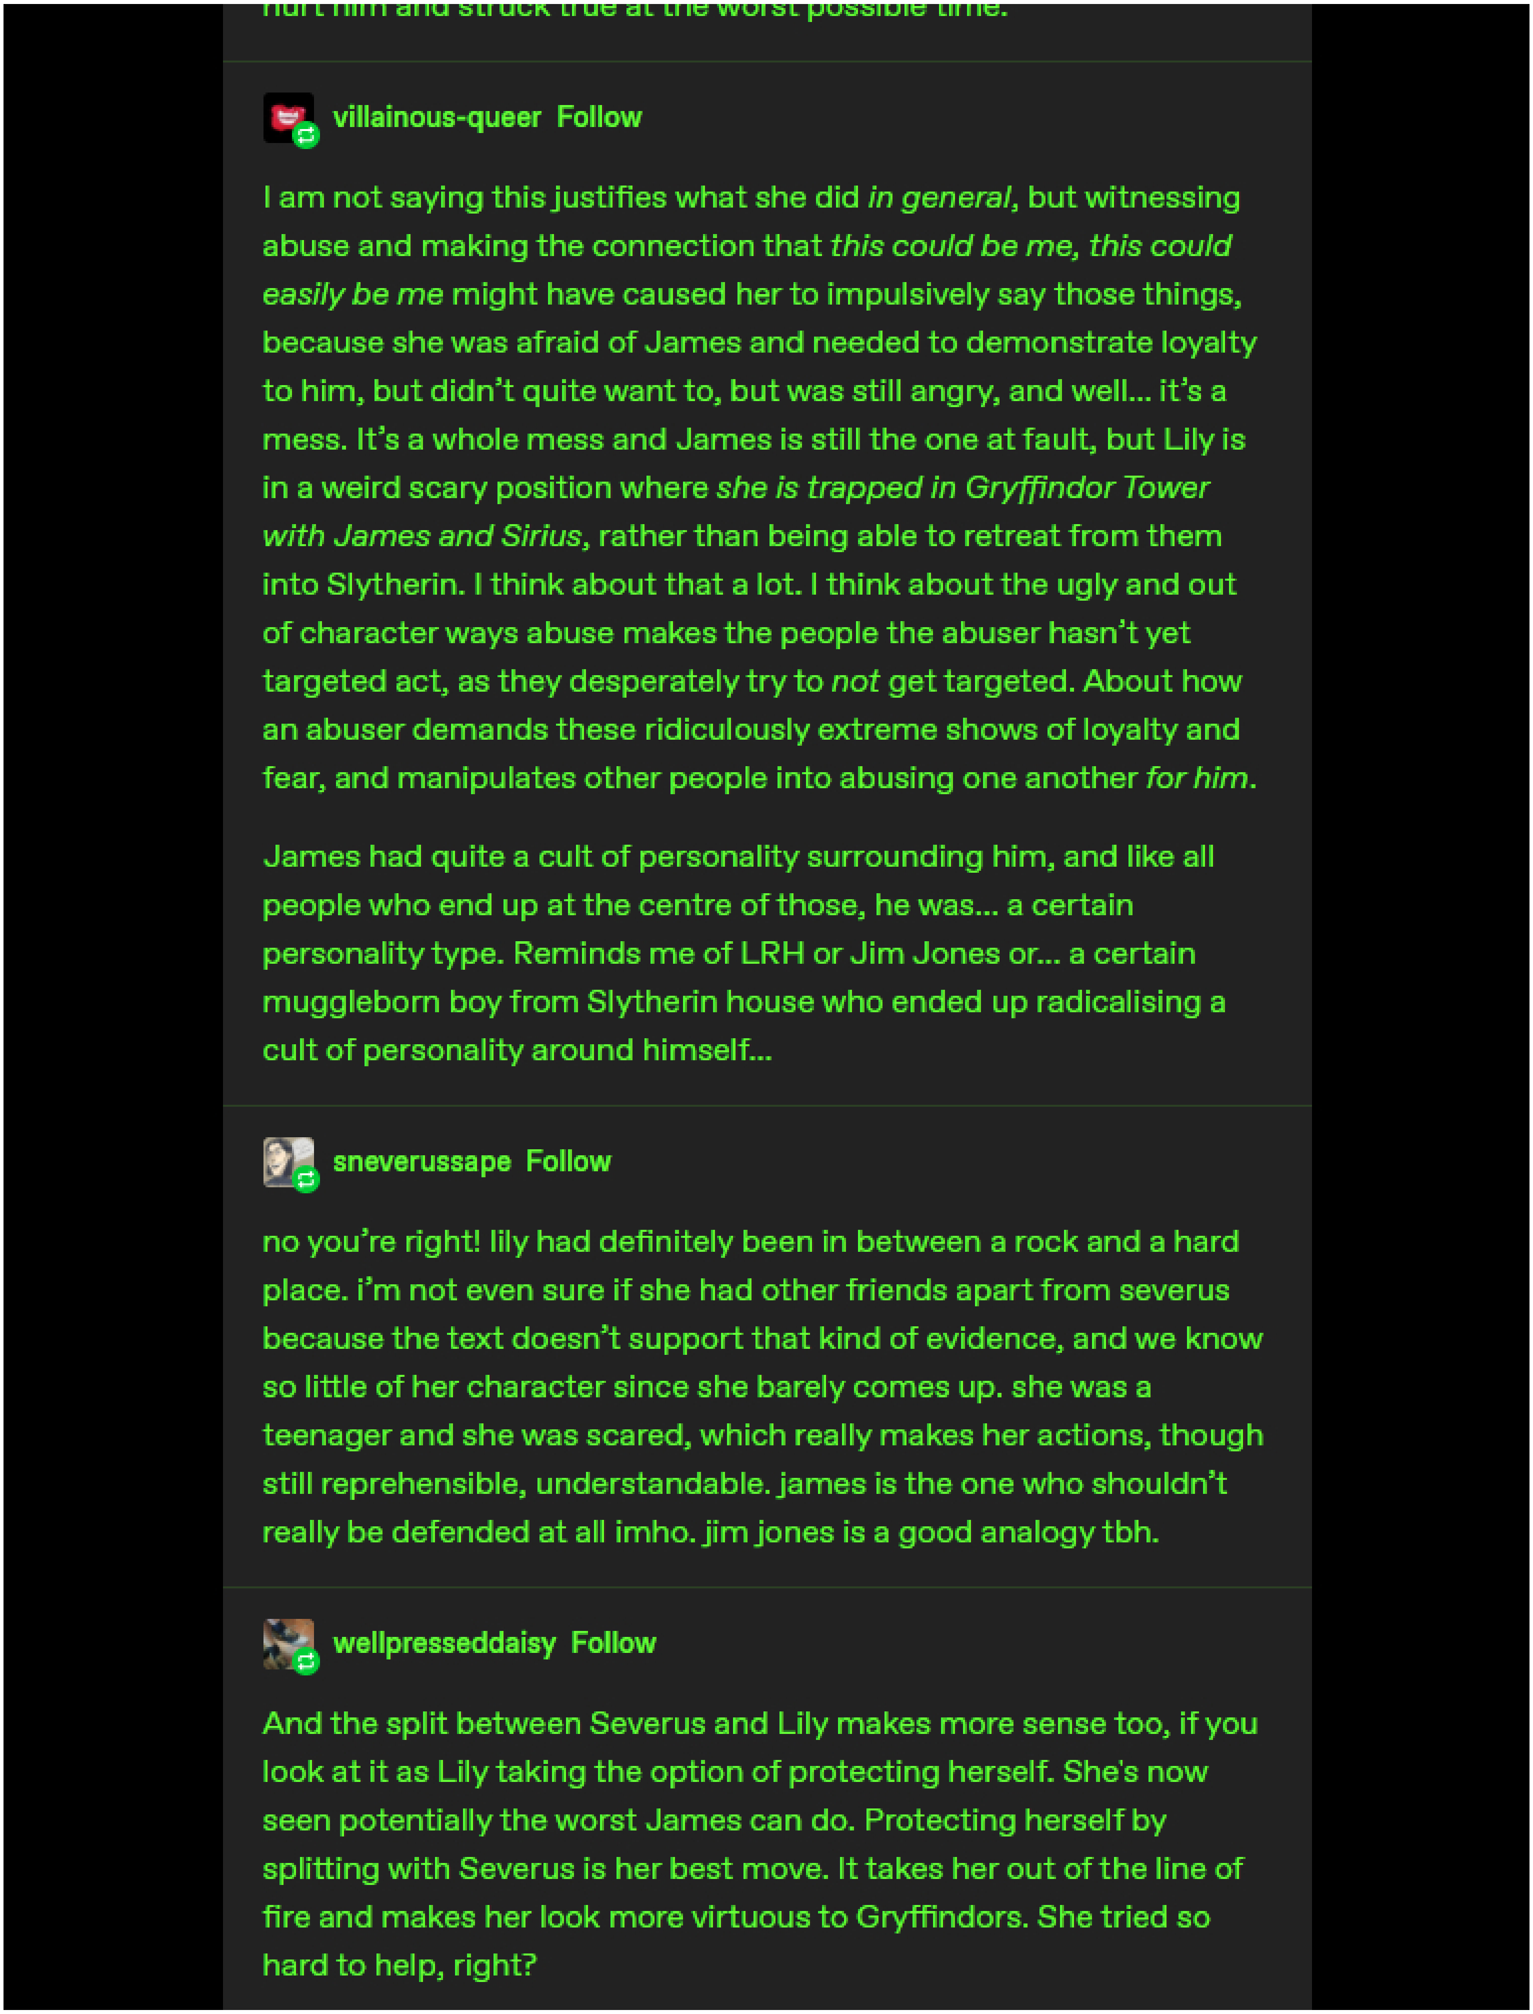
Does anyone else find it odd that in Snape's Worst Memory, Lily says nothing to Severus until she calls him Snivellus? Her whole attention is on James Potter until Severus also speaks to James (I don't need help from a filthy mudblood like her). They say nothing to each other and Lily shows no concern for Severus' condition. That's what I find to strange about the scene. It's like Severus is incidental to her need to yell at James Potter.

If one of my friends, one of my best friends, was being tortured, my first act would be to get the attackers off him and then ask if he's okay. Not stand there tossing my hair and ignoring my hurt and humiliated friend until he lashes out in rage and mortification.

Edited to add: Lily is also really quick off the mark to call him Snivellus. It just rolls off her tongue with no hesitation. What has she been saying about him behind his back?

sneverussape Follow

this was what wholly turned me off lily when i read the books. at this point in time she'd have known severus for longer than she had known james potter, and would have had a more intricate knowledge of how he operated. the fact that she had also thrown his poverty into his face was also a huge no-no for me. she knew exactly how to hurt him and struck true at the worst possible time.



hurt him and struck true at the worst possible time.

villainous-queer Follow

I am not saying this justifies what she did in general, but witnessing abuse and making the connection that this could be me, this could easily be me might have caused her to impulsively say those things, because she was afraid of James and needed to demonstrate loyalty to him, but didn't quite want to, but was still angry, and well… it's a mess. It's a whole mess and James is still the one at fault, but Lily is in a weird scary position where she is trapped in Gryffindor Tower with James and Sirius, rather than being able to retreat from them into Slytherin. I think about that a lot. I think about the ugly and out of character ways abuse makes the people the abuser hasn't yet targeted act, as they desperately try to not get targeted. About how an abuser demands these ridiculously extreme shows of loyalty and fear, and manipulates other people into abusing one another for him.

James had quite a cult of personality surrounding him, and like all people who end up at the centre of those, he was… a certain personality type. Reminds me of LRH or Jim Jones or… a certain muggleborn boy from Slytherin house who ended up radicalising a cult of personality around himself…

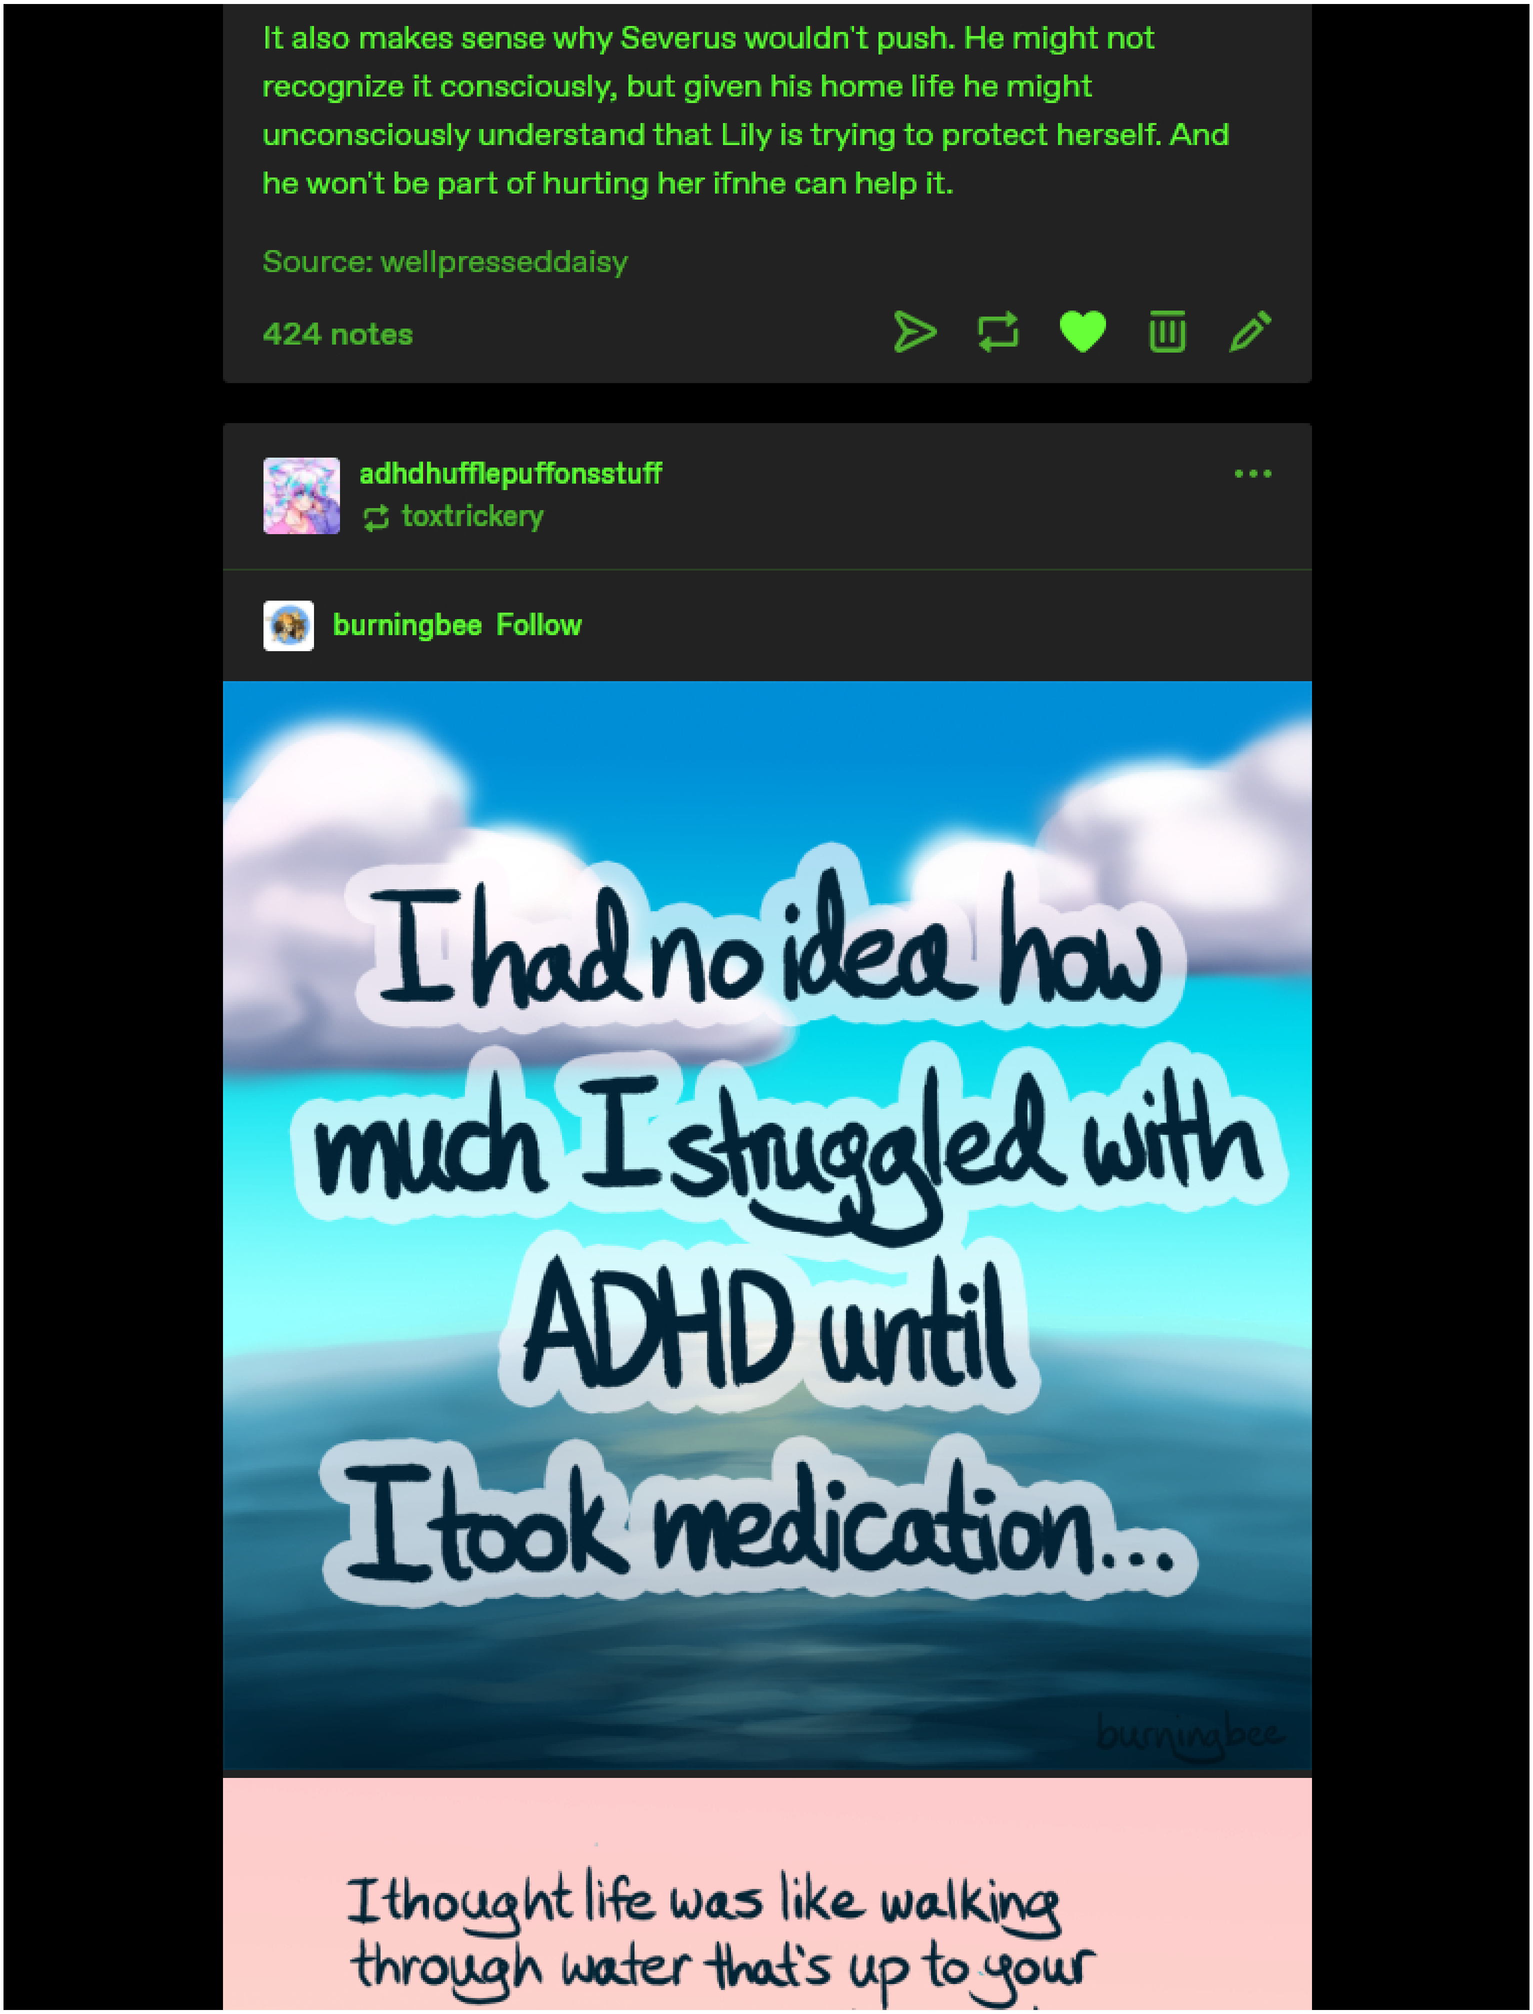
no you're right! lily had definitely been in between a rock and a hard place. i'm not even sure if she had other friends apart from severus because the text doesn't support that kind of evidence, and we know so little of her character since she barely comes up. she was a teenager and she was scared, which really makes her actions, though still reprehensible, understandable. james is the one who shouldn't really be defended at all imho. jim jones is a good analogy tbh.

wellpresseddaisy Follow

And the split between Severus and Lily makes more sense too, if you look at it as Lily taking the option of protecting herself. She's now seen potentially the worst James can do. Protecting herself by splitting with Severus is her best move. It takes her out of the line of fire and makes her look more virtuous to Gryffindors. She tried so hard to help, right?



It also makes sense why Severus wouldn't push. He might not recognize it consciously, but given his home life he might unconsciously understand that Lily is trying to protect herself. And he won't be part of hurting her ifnhe can help it.

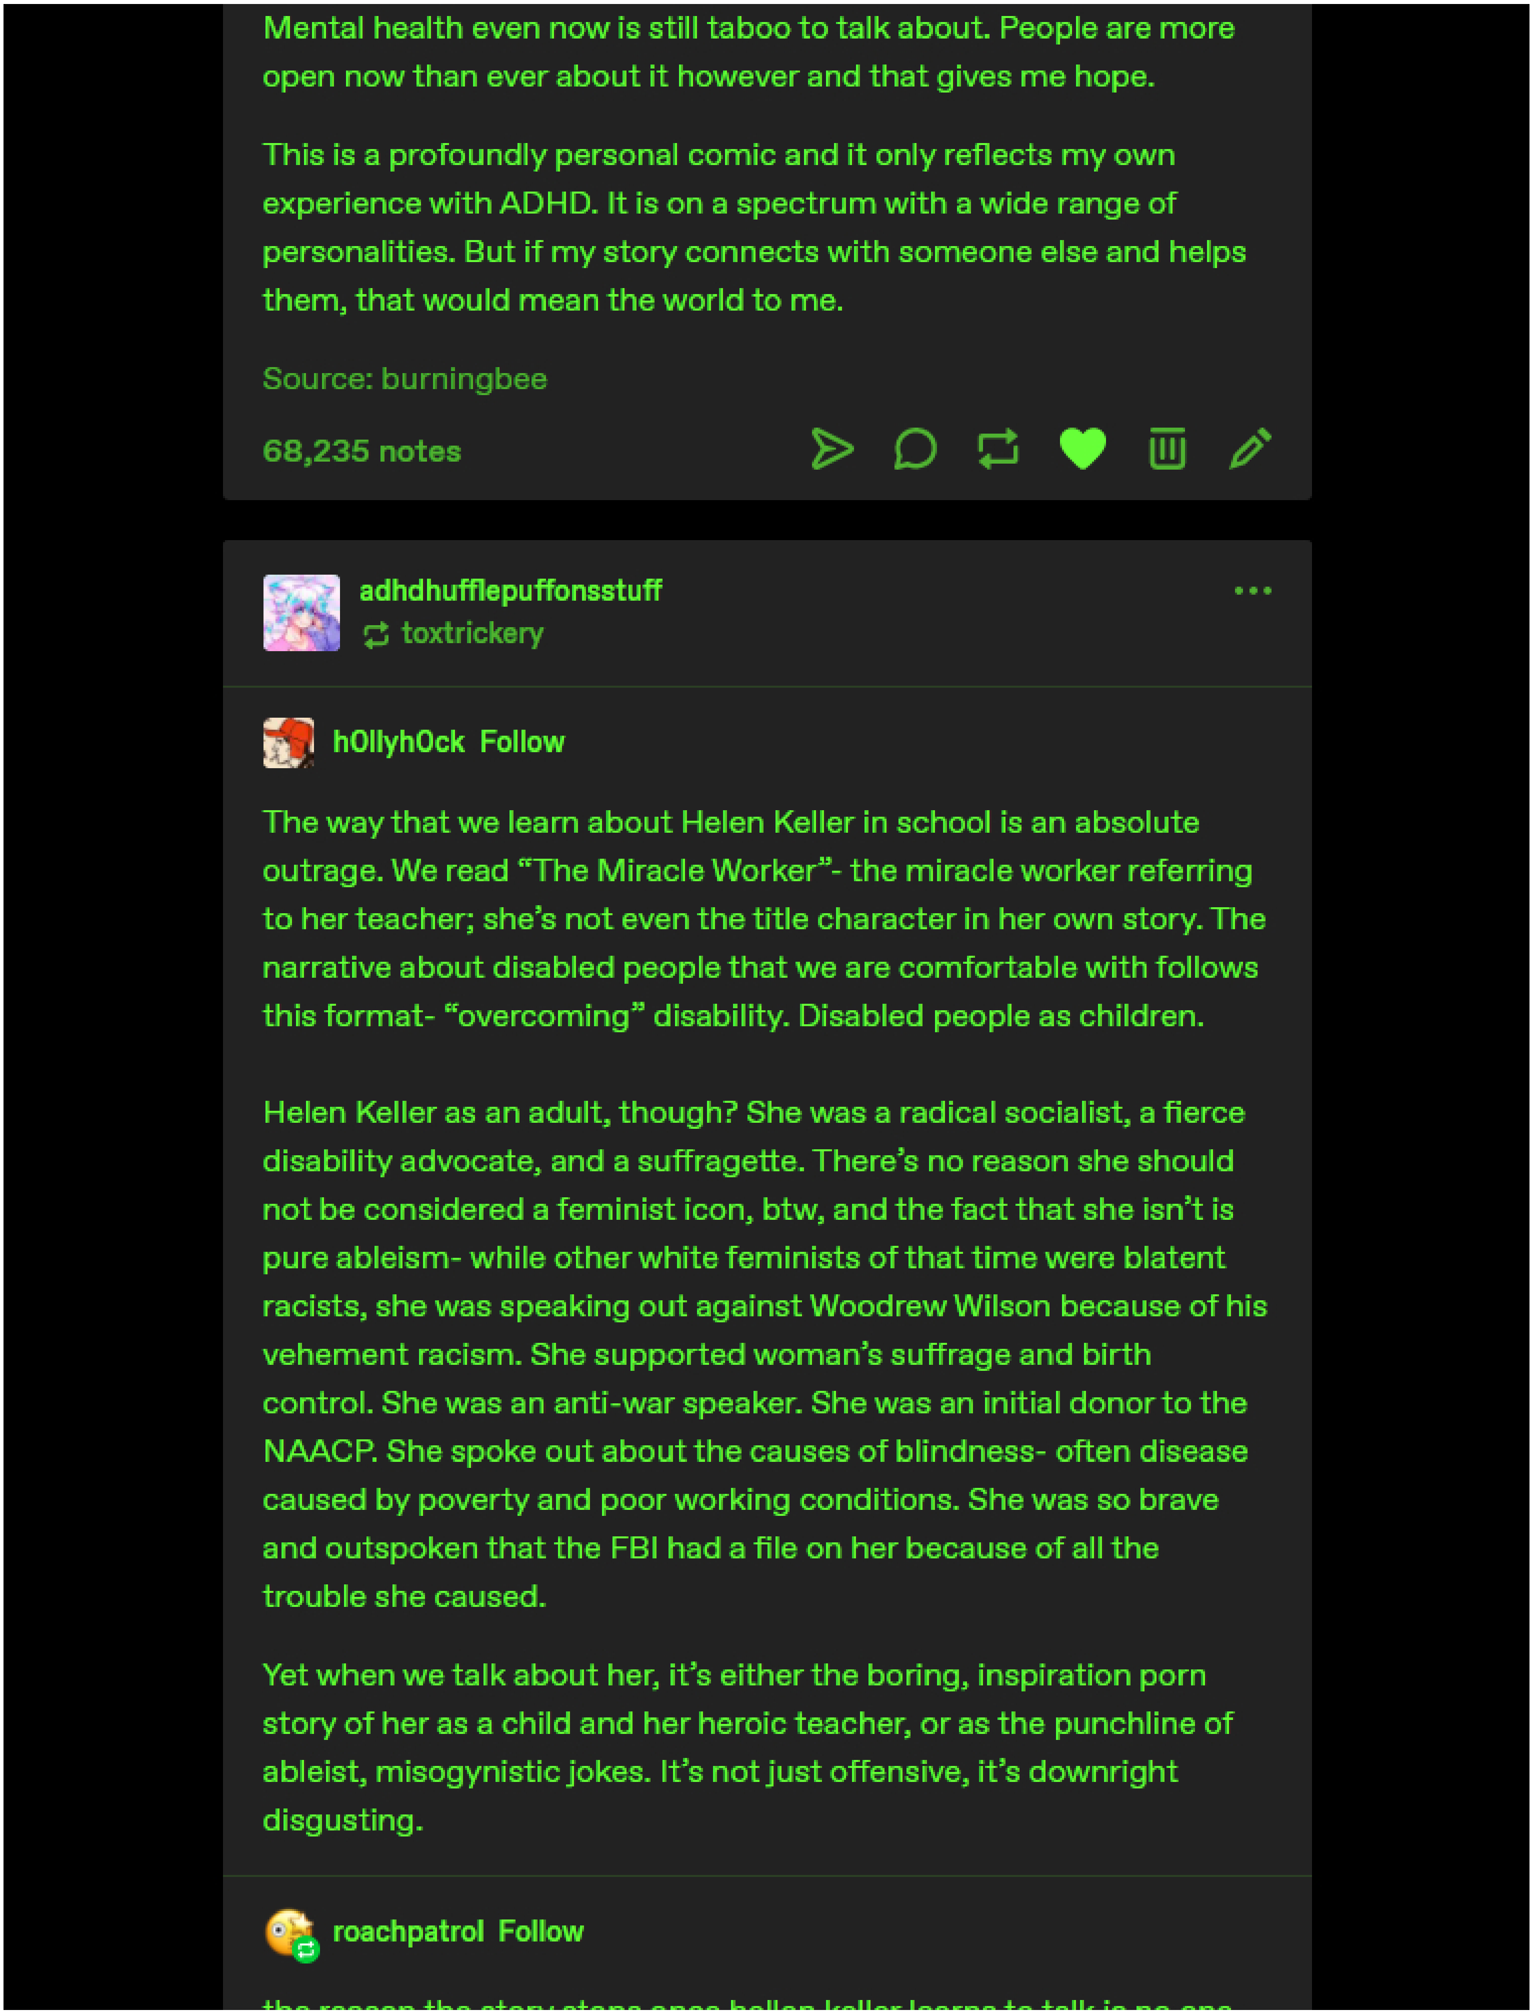
I figure out I had ADHD last year, but I didn't seek an official diagnosis and medication until this year. I'm 30 years old, my school days are long behind me. I slipped through the cracks because I have predominately inattentive type and I was a quiet little girl. Having ADHD does not mean you have to be hyperactive and loud, it means you have a processing problem in your brain that doesn't allow you to regulate your focus or emotions.



Mental health even now is still taboo to talk about. People are more open now than ever about it however and that gives me hope.

This is a profoundly personal comic and it only reflects my own experience with ADHD. It is on a spectrum with a wide range of personalities. But if my story connects with someone else and helps them, that would mean the world to me.

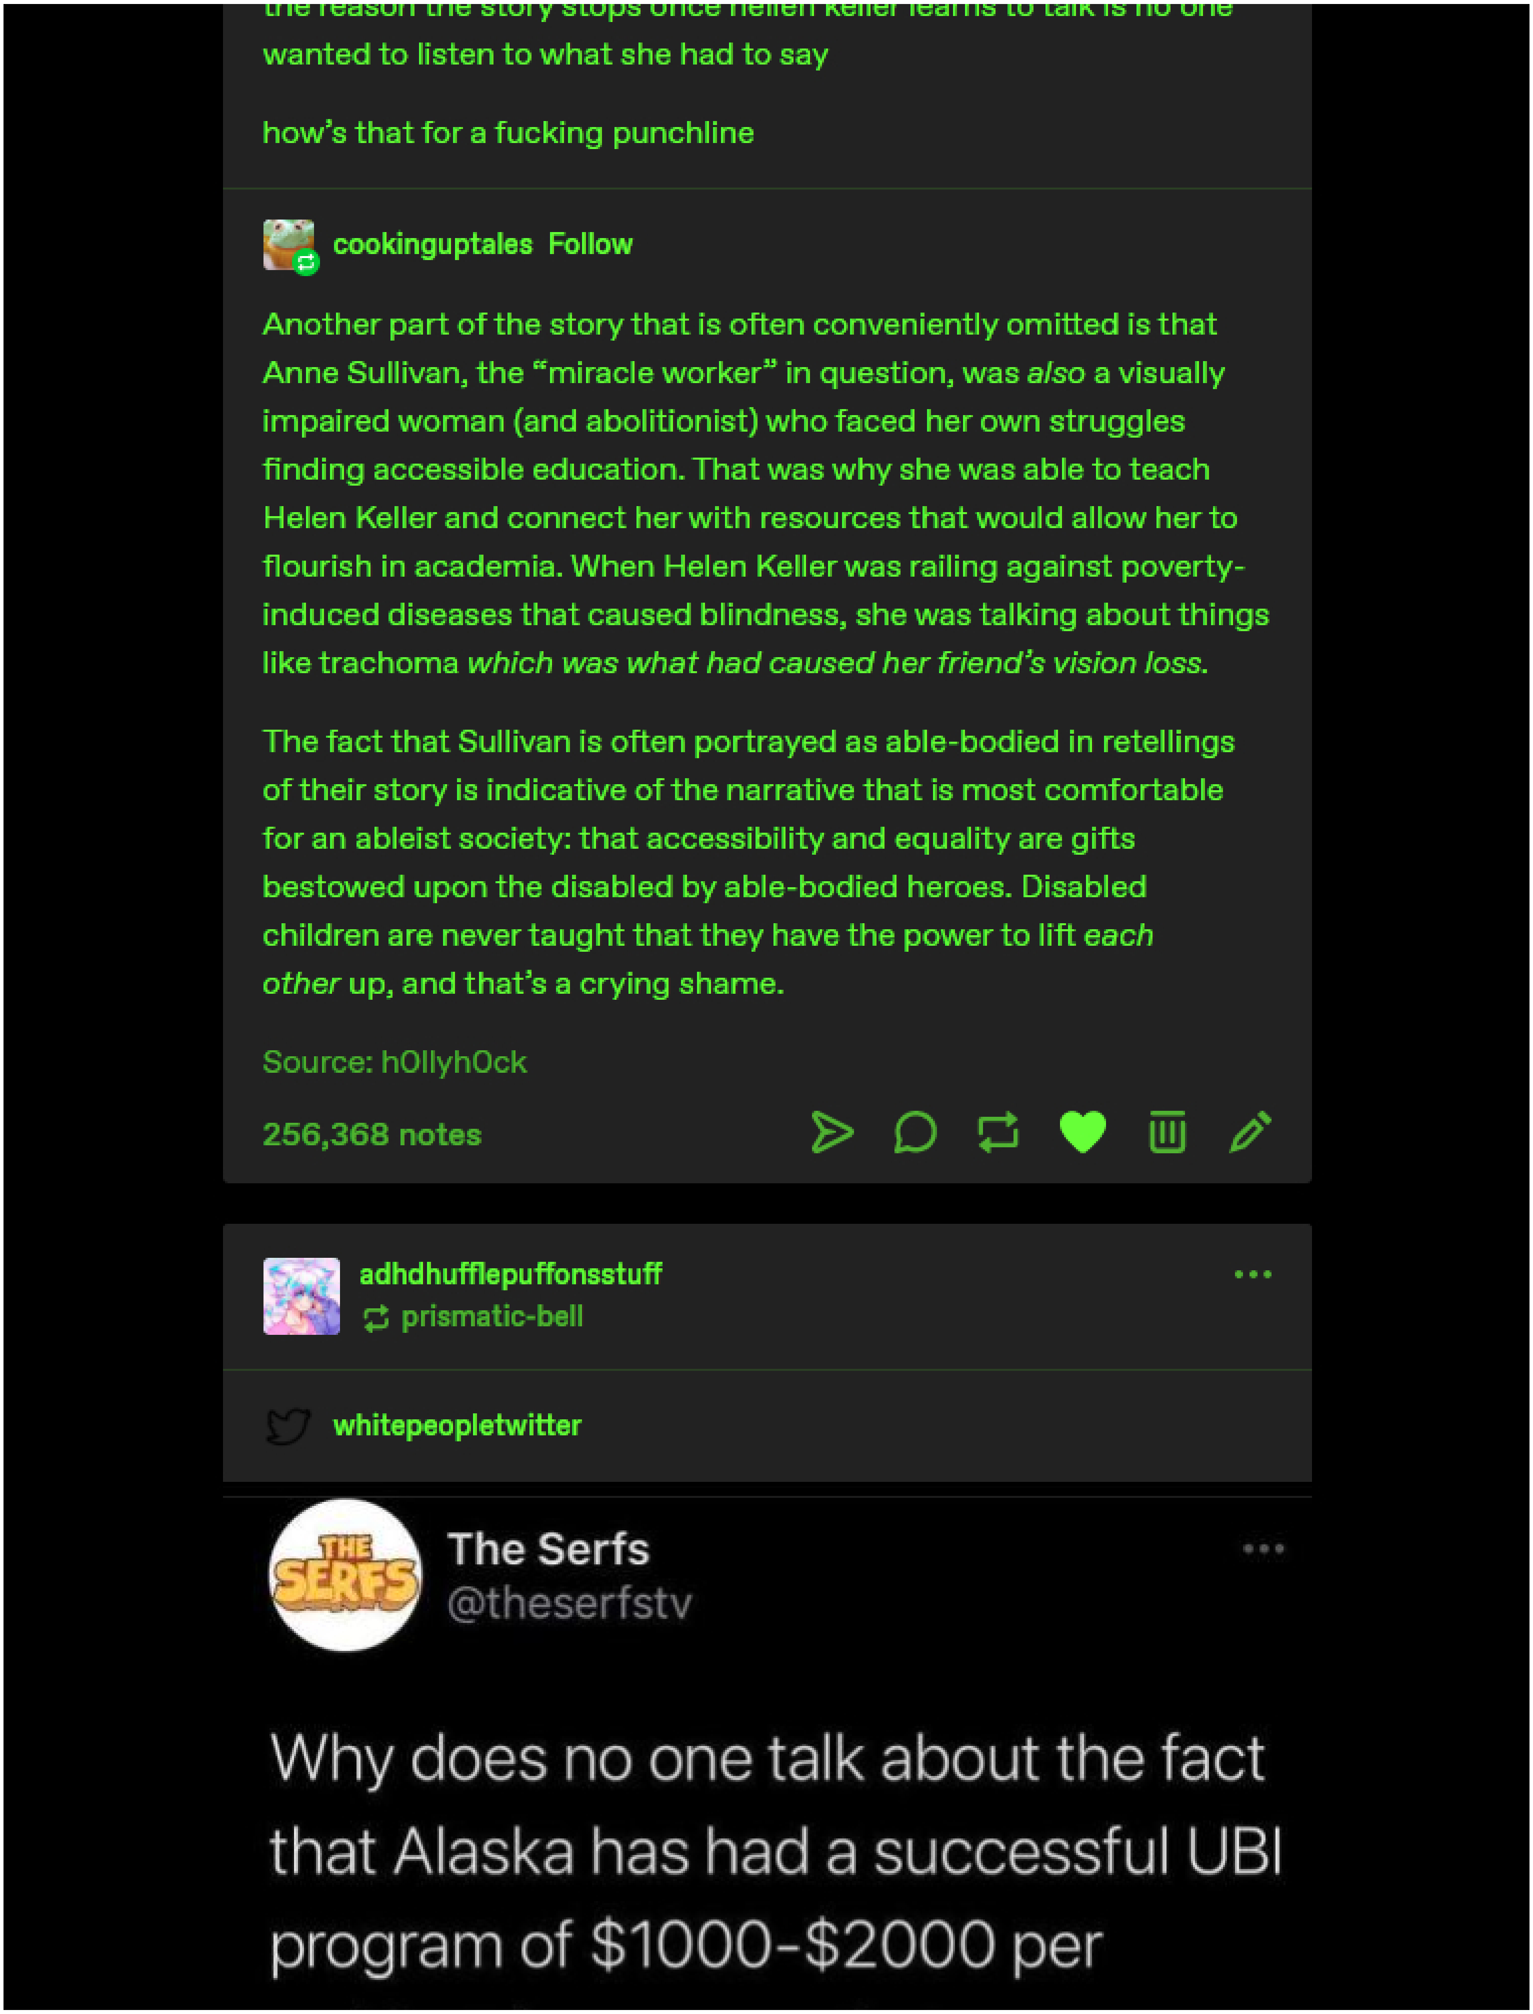
The way that we learn about Helen Keller in school is an absolute outrage. We read “The Miracle Worker”- the miracle worker referring to her teacher; she’s not even the title character in her own story. The narrative about disabled people that we are comfortable with follows this format- “overcoming” disability. Disabled people as children.

Helen Keller as an adult, though? She was a radical socialist, a fierce disability advocate, and a suffragette. There’s no reason she should not be considered a feminist icon, btw, and the fact that she isn’t is pure ableism- while other white feminists of that time were blatent racists, she was speaking out against Woodrew Wilson because of his vehement racism. She supported woman’s suffrage and birth control. She was an anti-war speaker. She was an initial donor to the NAACP. She spoke out about the causes of blindness- often disease caused by poverty and poor working conditions. She was so brave and outspoken that the FBI had a file on her because of all the trouble she caused.

Yet when we talk about her, it’s either the boring, inspiration porn story of her as a child and her heroic teacher, or as the punchline of ableist, misogynistic jokes. It’s not just offensive, it’s downright disgusting.

roachpatrol Follow

the reason the story stops once hellen keller learns to talk is no one



the reason the story stops once helen keller learns to talk is no one wanted to listen to what she had to say

how's that for a fucking punchline

cookinguptales Follow

Another part of the story that is often conveniently omitted is that Anne Sullivan, the "miracle worker" in question, was also a visually impaired woman (and abolitionist) who faced her own struggles finding accessible education. That was why she was able to teach Helen Keller and connect her with resources that would allow her to flourish in academia. When Helen Keller was railing against poverty-induced diseases that caused blindness, she was talking about things like trachoma which was what had caused her friend's vision loss.

The fact that Sullivan is often portrayed as able-bodied in retellings of their story is indicative of the narrative that is most comfortable for an ableist society: that accessibility and equality are gifts bestowed upon the disabled by able-bodied heroes. Disabled children are never taught that they have the power to lift each other up, and that's a crying shame.

Haha, well, it is pretty much what happens. Sam is looking for Frodo in the tower of Cirith Ungol and is despairing that he will ever find him. He sits down and does what any self-respecting Tolkien character does during their moments of hopelessness and bursts into song.

It's a really good song (ten year old Ship had it memorized) and as he begins the refrain a second time, he hears Frodo's voice answering weakly from above. Frodo is poisoned and despairing and beaten but he is still a Hobbit and cannot resist a singalong even while on the brink of death.

I work someplace with those! The tube container is closed. You remove it from the tube, walk it out of the building, hold one end, twist open the other and drop it in the bushes/grass/plot of nature away from the door. Gently. The bees are probably very confused.

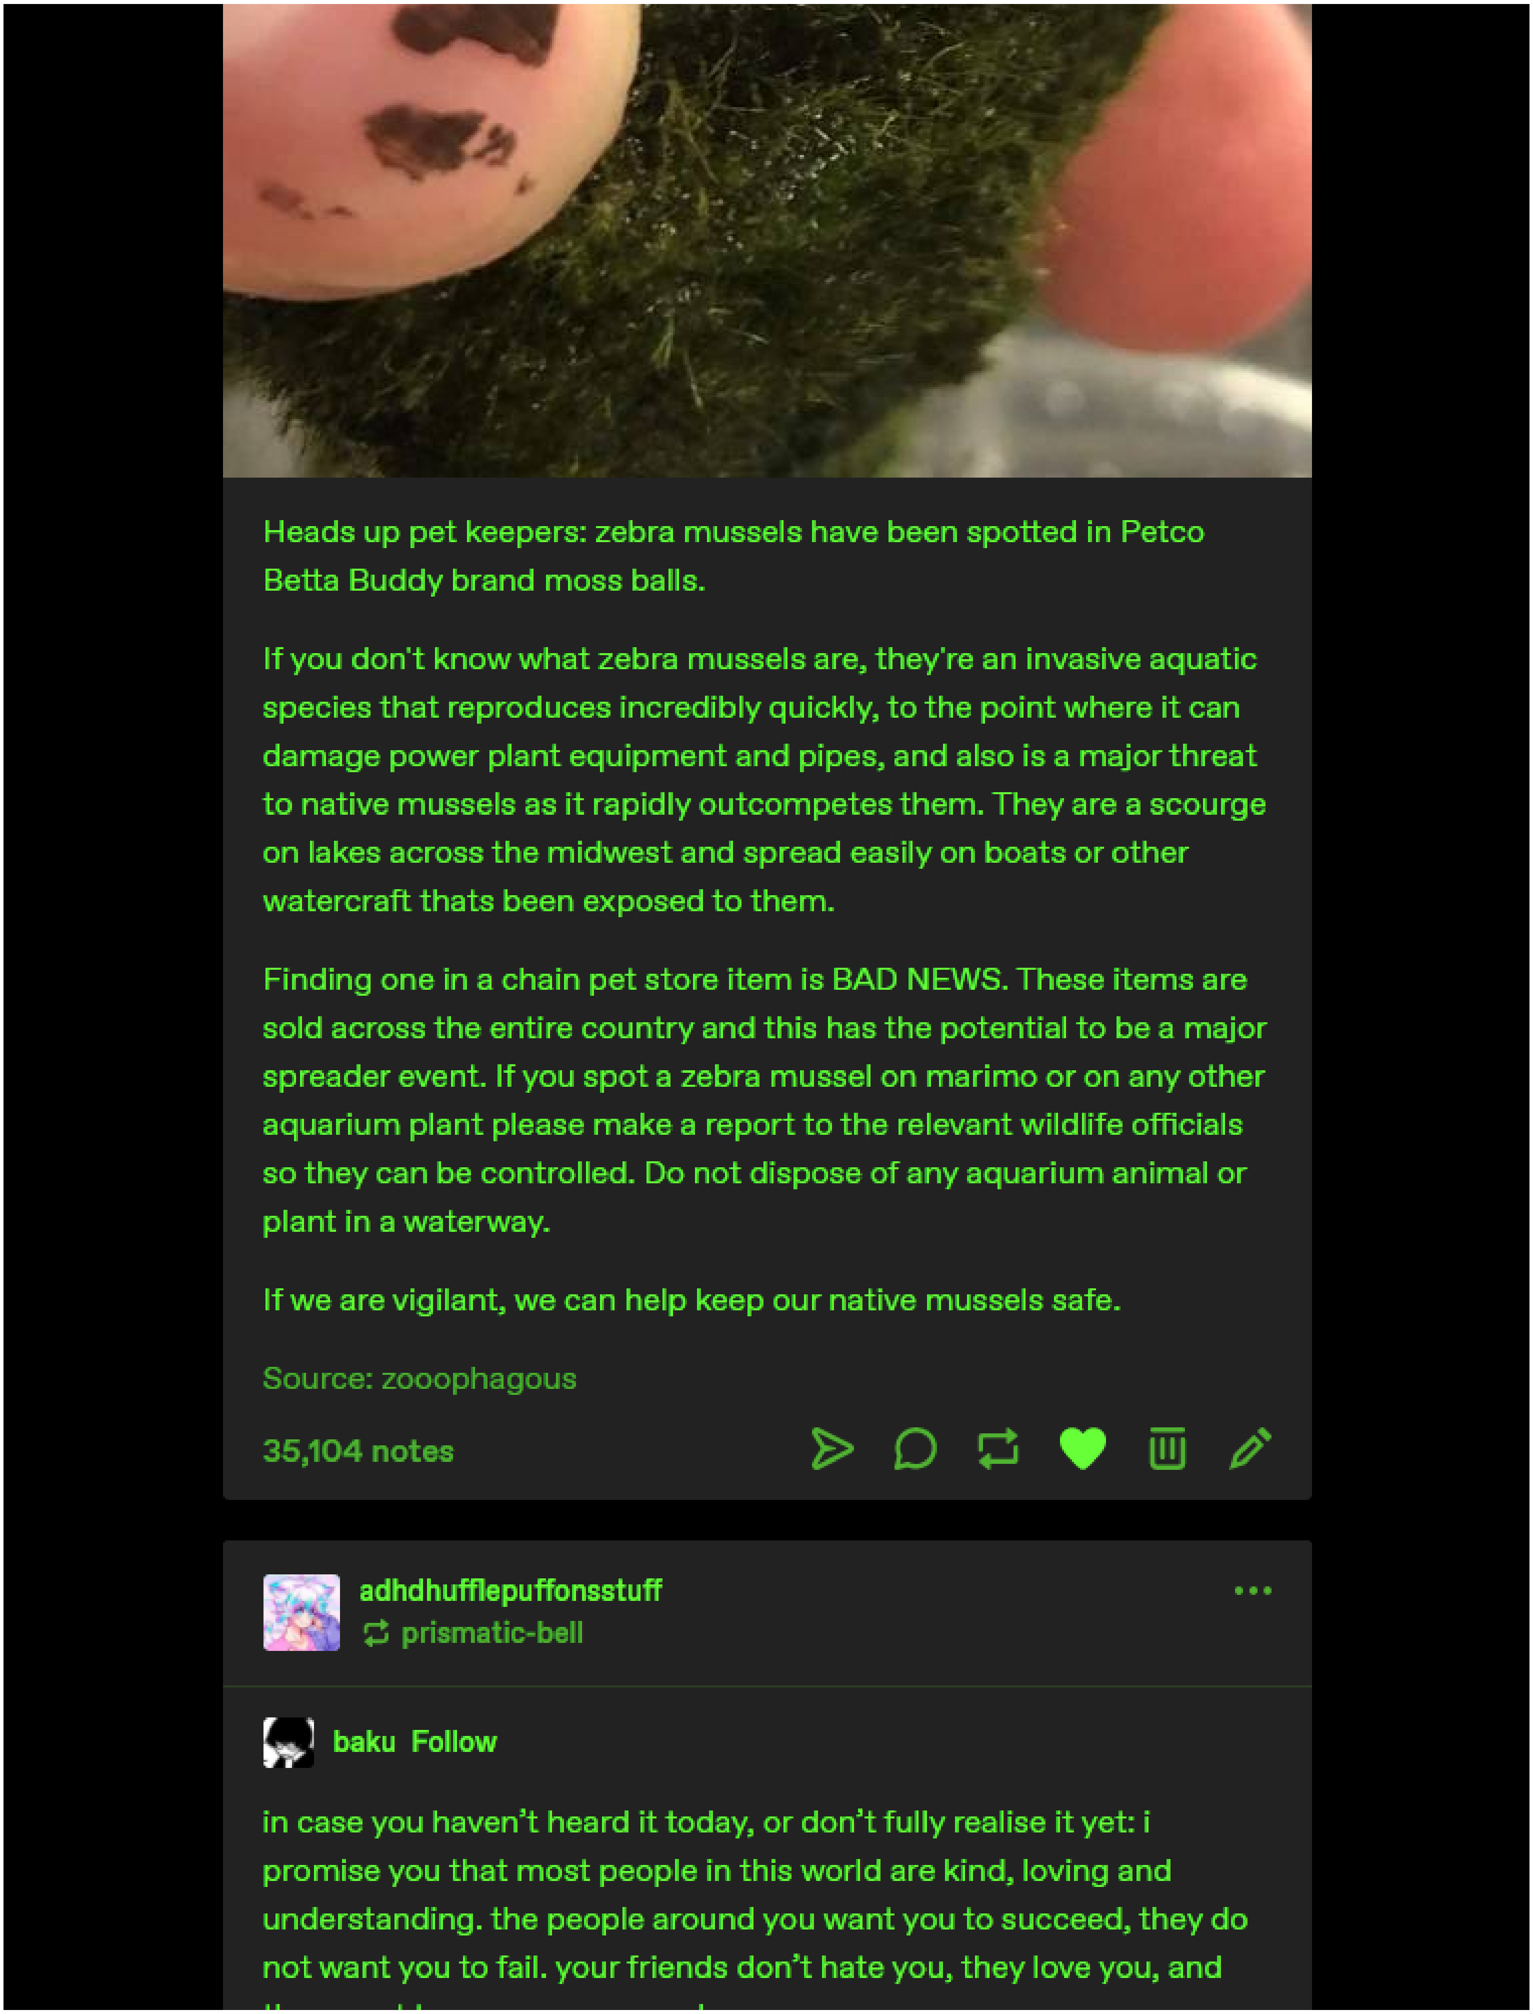
There has been a troubling sighting report from Seattle. A pet store employee has been finding zebra mussels attached and inside moss balls sold as aquarium plants. The significant danger is these moss balls are being distributed across the U.S. We are asking that you please check out your local pet stores here in Oregon to see if they are selling “Betta Buddy” brand moss balls. Please contact Rick Boatner immediately (503-947-6308; Rick.J.Boatner@state.or.us) if you find any.



Heads up pet keepers: zebra mussels have been spotted in Petco Betta Buddy brand moss balls.

If you don't know what zebra mussels are, they're an invasive aquatic species that reproduces incredibly quickly, to the point where it can damage power plant equipment and pipes, and also is a major threat to native mussels as it rapidly outcompetes them. They are a scourge on lakes across the midwest and spread easily on boats or other watercraft thats been exposed to them.

Finding one in a chain pet store item is BAD NEWS. These items are sold across the entire country and this has the potential to be a major spreader event. If you spot a zebra mussel on marimo or on any other aquarium plant please make a report to the relevant wildlife officials so they can be controlled. Do not dispose of any aquarium animal or plant in a waterway.

If we are vigilant, we can help keep our native mussels safe.

The first Japanese woman to go to college didn't have a choice.

The daughter of defeated samurai, she was sent abroad to learn from the west and report back.

The trip changed her. She came back determined to change her homeland.

This is her story.

Her name was Sakiko Yamakawa.

She was only eight years old when troops came for her town. As samurai of Japan's Aizu clan, her family were on the losing side of a civil war that would end the age of the sword*.

The last stand came when enemy forces closed in on Aizu castle. Behind those walls, Sakiko did a woman's duty: she ran ammunition to the gunners. She ran empty shells to the storehouse. And when artillery fire landed nearby, she smothered the shells with wet quilts to prevent explosions.

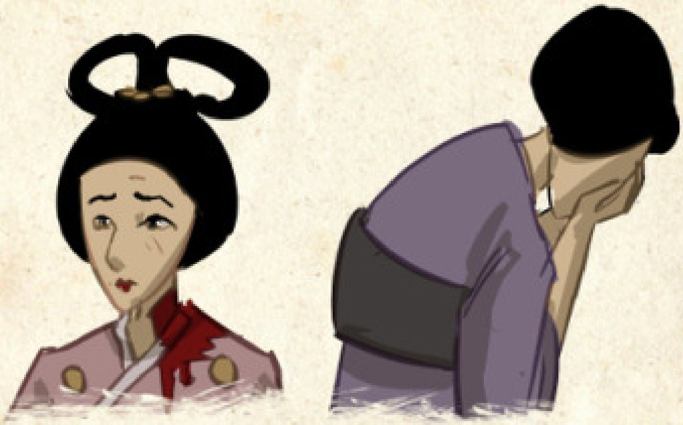
Which is how Sakiko's sister-in-law died.

* - for more on this check out the entry on Takeko Nakano at http://www.rejectedprincesses.com/princesses/takeko-nakano

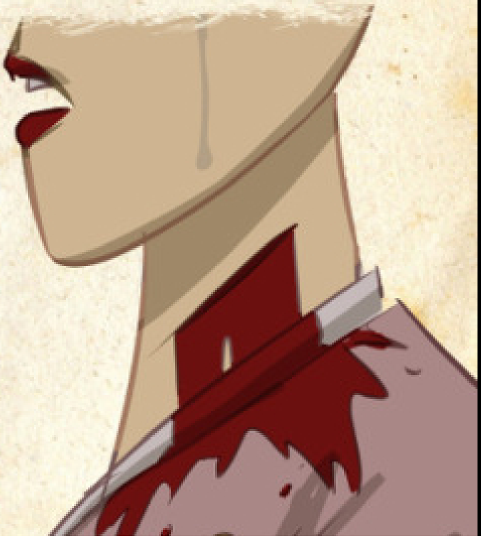
The sister-in-law was running to a shell when it burst. The majority of the shrapnel hit her in the chest, with an errant piece slicing Sakiko in the neck.

This did not kill her sister immediately.

As she laid there bleeding, the sister yelled for Sakiko's mother to give her an honorable death.

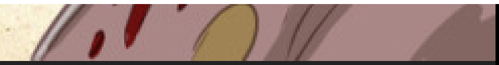


Sakiko's mother could not bear to do it.



Sakiko watched as her sister died slowly in the open. She said goodbye from afar.

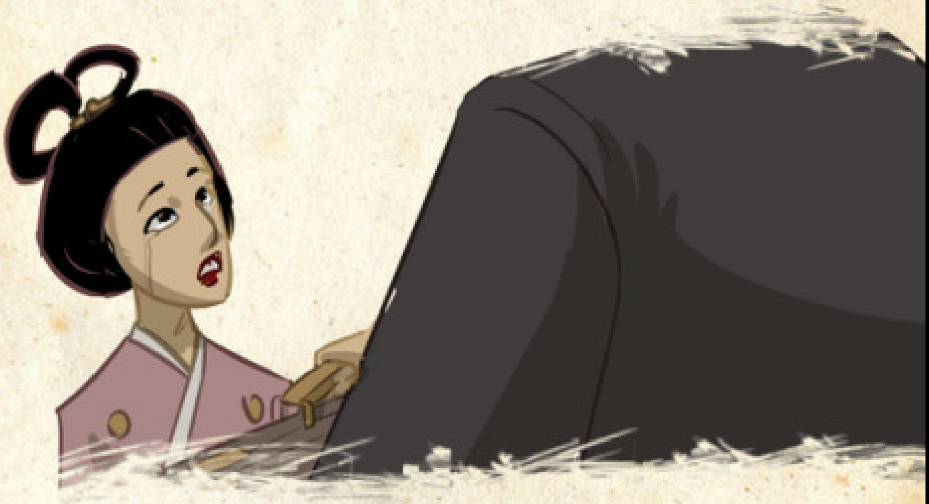
Sakiko's neck would bear that shrapnel scar until the end of her days.



After the war, the Japanese government ended its centuries of isolation. Humbled by foreigners who'd forced their ports open at gunpoint, the Japanese viewed learning from the barbarians as a matter of survival.

They offered a kingly sum for volunteers willing to go abroad for ten years. They had almost no applicants.

Until Sakiko's brother signed her up to go to America.



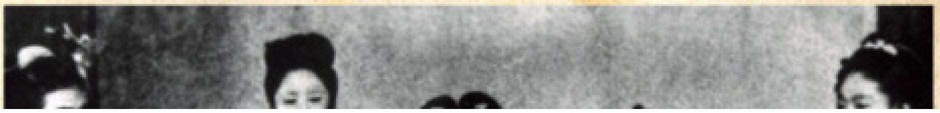
He didn't ask her.

For him, it solved two problems: it increased the family profile, and gave them one less mouth to feed.

She knew no English. She'd never left Japan.

Almost nobody ever had.

And so, at age 11, Sakiko joined a group of four other girls, aged six to 14, as the first women to go to the West.



None of them had been asked.

The last time Sakiko saw her mother, she was given a new name: Sutematsu.

捨松

It was an odd, sorrowful name, combining the character for "discard" and the name of the defeated lord of Aizu.

Her old life was over.

Her name was Sutematsu.

She arrived in the United States six years after the American Civil War. As she and the four other girls made their way from west to east across the country, they were bewildered time and time again.

In San Francisco they witnessed blackface for the first time. In Utah they saw snowball fights for the first time. In Illinois they visited the smoldering aftermath of the Great Chicago Fire.

In D.C., they went to dinner with some young notables.

When Sutematsu asked one if he spoke Japanese, he replied with an invented string of foreign-sounding gibberish, and then burst into laughter.

Terrified, she and the other girls kept to themselves, even as the press hounded them, trying to get a glimpse of the exotic princesses.

They weren't princesses.

Not that anyone would listen.

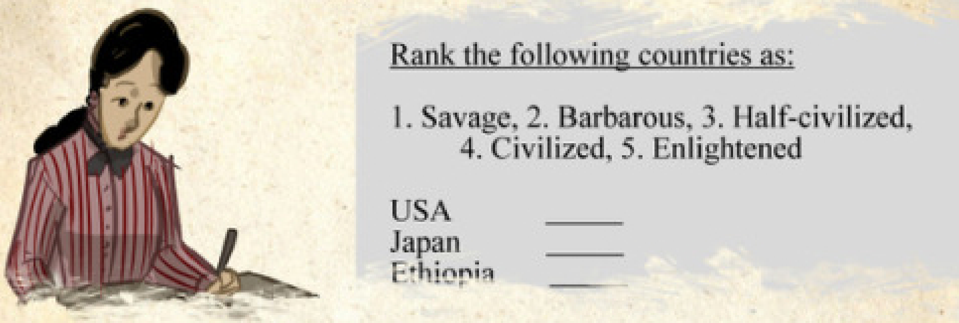
But gradually they were separated. First to go were the two eldest, for whom the stress was too much. They returned to Japan. The remaining 3 – Sutematsu, Shige, and Ume – clung together so tightly that even after several months in the US, none had learned any English.

They were each sent to different foster homes.

Her name was Stemats.

Nobody in her new family could pronounce her name, so they gave her a simpler one. She was welcomed in and soon sent off to public school.

Despite a bumpy start, she excelled.



Rank the following countries as:

1. Savage, 2. Barbarous, 3. Half-civilized, 4. Civilized, 5. Enlightened

USA _____
Japan _____
Ethiopia _____

Not only did she get top grades in high school, she was the only girl in her class to go to college. She went to Vassar, which had only been admitting women for ten years.

She became class valedictorian.

My country will never become advanced until her women and mothers are educated.

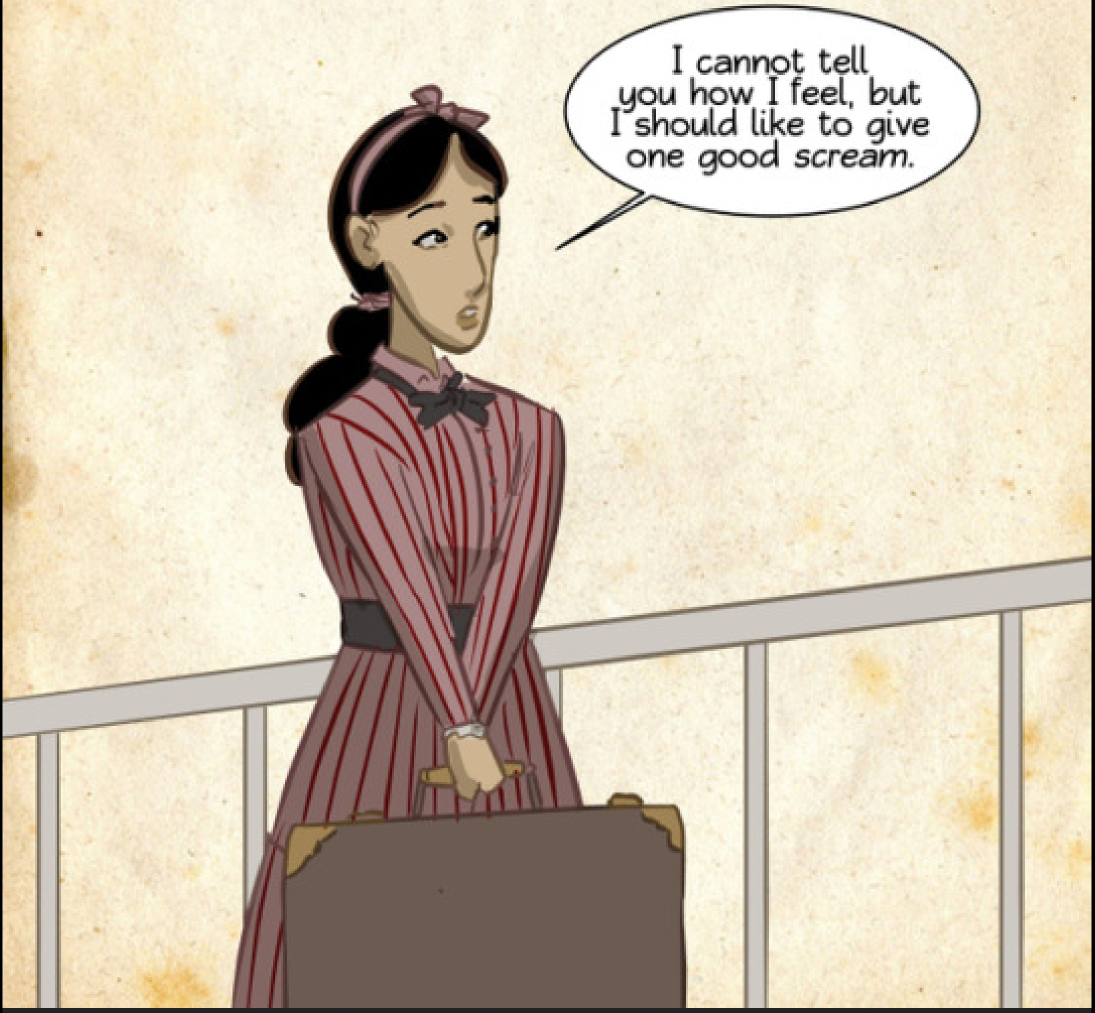
She was the most educated Japanese woman alive.

After over a decade away from her native land, she headed back, to live with a family with whom she could barely speak a common language.

She was nervous. She had changed so much. Spent her formative years in another country.

When asked how she felt to return, she replied,



I cannot tell you how I feel, but I should like to give one good scream.

Japan greeted her back courteously, but the political winds had shifted. Where once had existed a fervor to modernize, instead was a conservative backlash. Tradition, not change, was the order of the day. Japan had no use for Stemats.

Stemats was an alien in her own country.

So she set out to change her country.

She and the other two girls sent abroad - Shige and Ume - began spending more time together. They began pursuing a common goal: opening a school for girls.

But they needed funding. And social standing.

It came from the place she least expected.

His name was Iwao Oyama.

He was high up in the army, where he'd served for many years. He'd been at the Battle of Aizu. He'd been on the opposing side.

He bore scars from bullets that may have been carried by Stemats.

He had fired shells that may have killed Stemats' sister.

He was asking Stemats' hand in marriage.

Her family said no immediately.

But she thought about it.

She'd been back for years, and isolation had worn her down. She wanted to do more.

Iwao afforded that.She did not love him, but what was her life save a series of sacrifices for her country?

In the end, she said yes.

Her name was Sutematsu Oyama.

Her new surname was appropriate for one who had - for the first time willingly - given her life to Japan. It translated to Great Mountain.

It was in the shadow of Mount Fuji she got to work.

With the empress's patronage, she started the Peeresses' School, which taught noble women. It was a start.

She brought on Ume as one of the teachers, and her foster sister from America as another.

As her profile grew, she became a gossip target. She was not Japanese enough. She was too close to the empress.

When her stepdaughter died of illness, a "fiction" novel blamed her proxy for it, painting Sutematsu as a cruel, power-hungry villain.

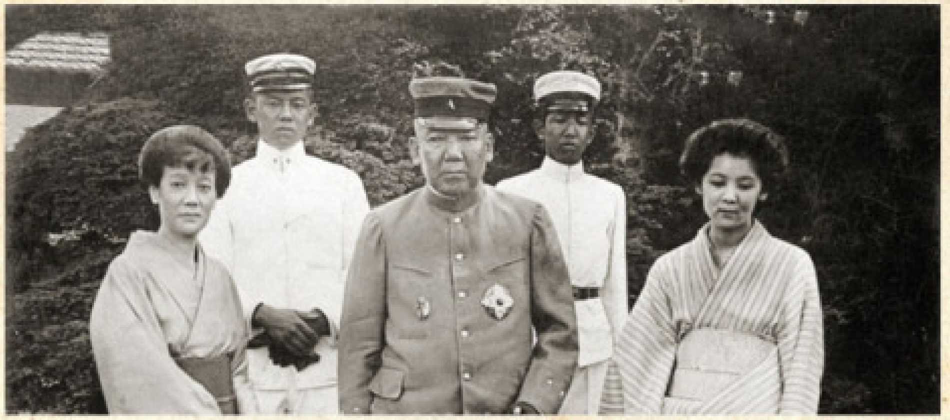
It became a bestseller.

Her successes came with a tradeoff of more isolation.

The higher she rose, the less she could directly work on teaching, or see her friends Ume and Shige. She was even given the title "princess" - after years of being called one.

In one letter to her foster sister, she wrote:

"My husband grows fatter every year, and I thinner."



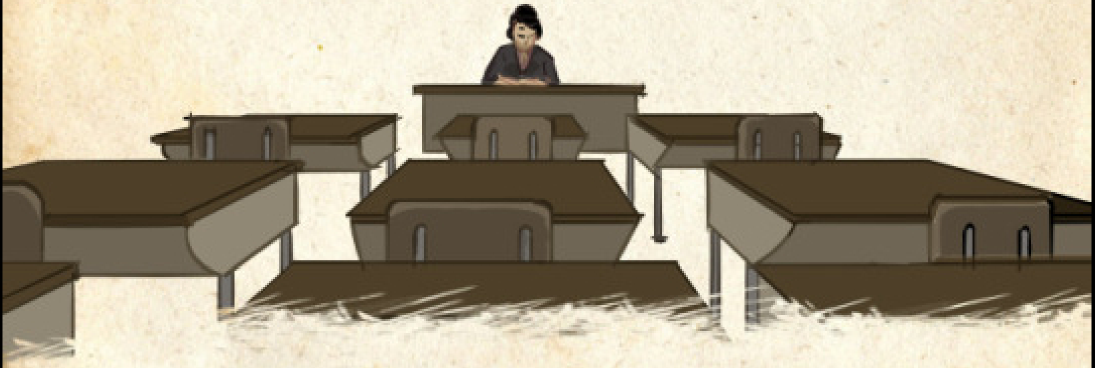
But her sacrifices paid off.

In 1899, the government mandated each prefecture create at least one girls' school.

The next year, Ume left the Peeresses' School to start a women's college open to all. Sutematsu helped fund it.

In 1919, a great flu epidemic ravaged Tokyo - just like the one that had claimed Sutematsu's stepdaughter several years earlier.

Ume, her health already declining, had recently resigned from running the school. Sutematsu faced a choice: flee the plague, or look after the school.

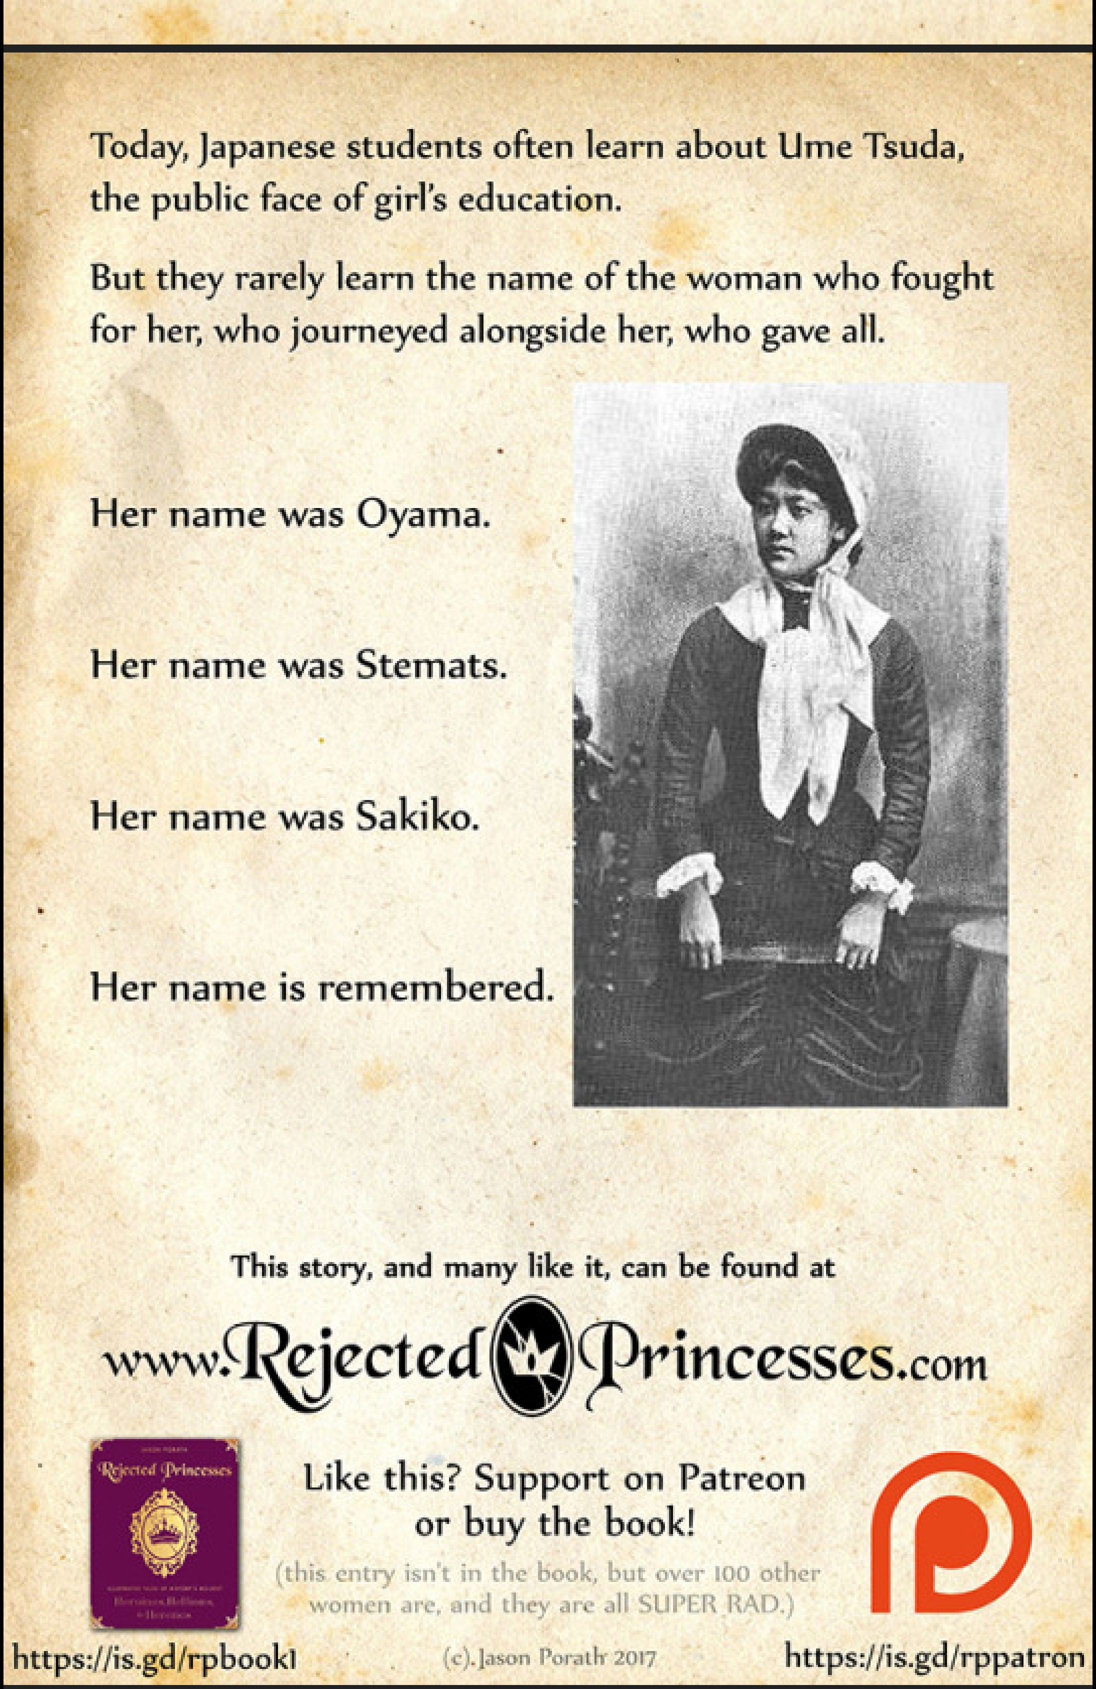


Sutematsu stayed behind.

She had to make sure the school continued.

The day after she found a replacement, she awoke with a sore throat.

She died two weeks later.



Today, Japanese students often learn about Ume Tsuda, the public face of girl's education.

But they rarely learn the name of the woman who fought for her, who journeyed alongside her, who gave all.

Her name was Oyama.

Her name was Stemats.

Her name was Sakiko.

Her name is remembered.

there's a difference between "being canceled" and "facing consequences" but there's also a fine line between "facing consequences" and "deincentivizing growth and change" and i think that needs to be grappled with more. i'm not saying all mistakes need to be forgiven by everyone, but people who make mistakes are people, and if it becomes clear that not only will they will never be forgiven for their past, but that they will also be continually punished, then it's a normal human response to grow frustrated and stop trying, and the holier-than-thou response of "well if they were really sorry, they would willingly accept all the punishments we throw their way" is stupid. what does pulling receipts up from 20 years ago do? who do these "gotcha" moments help?

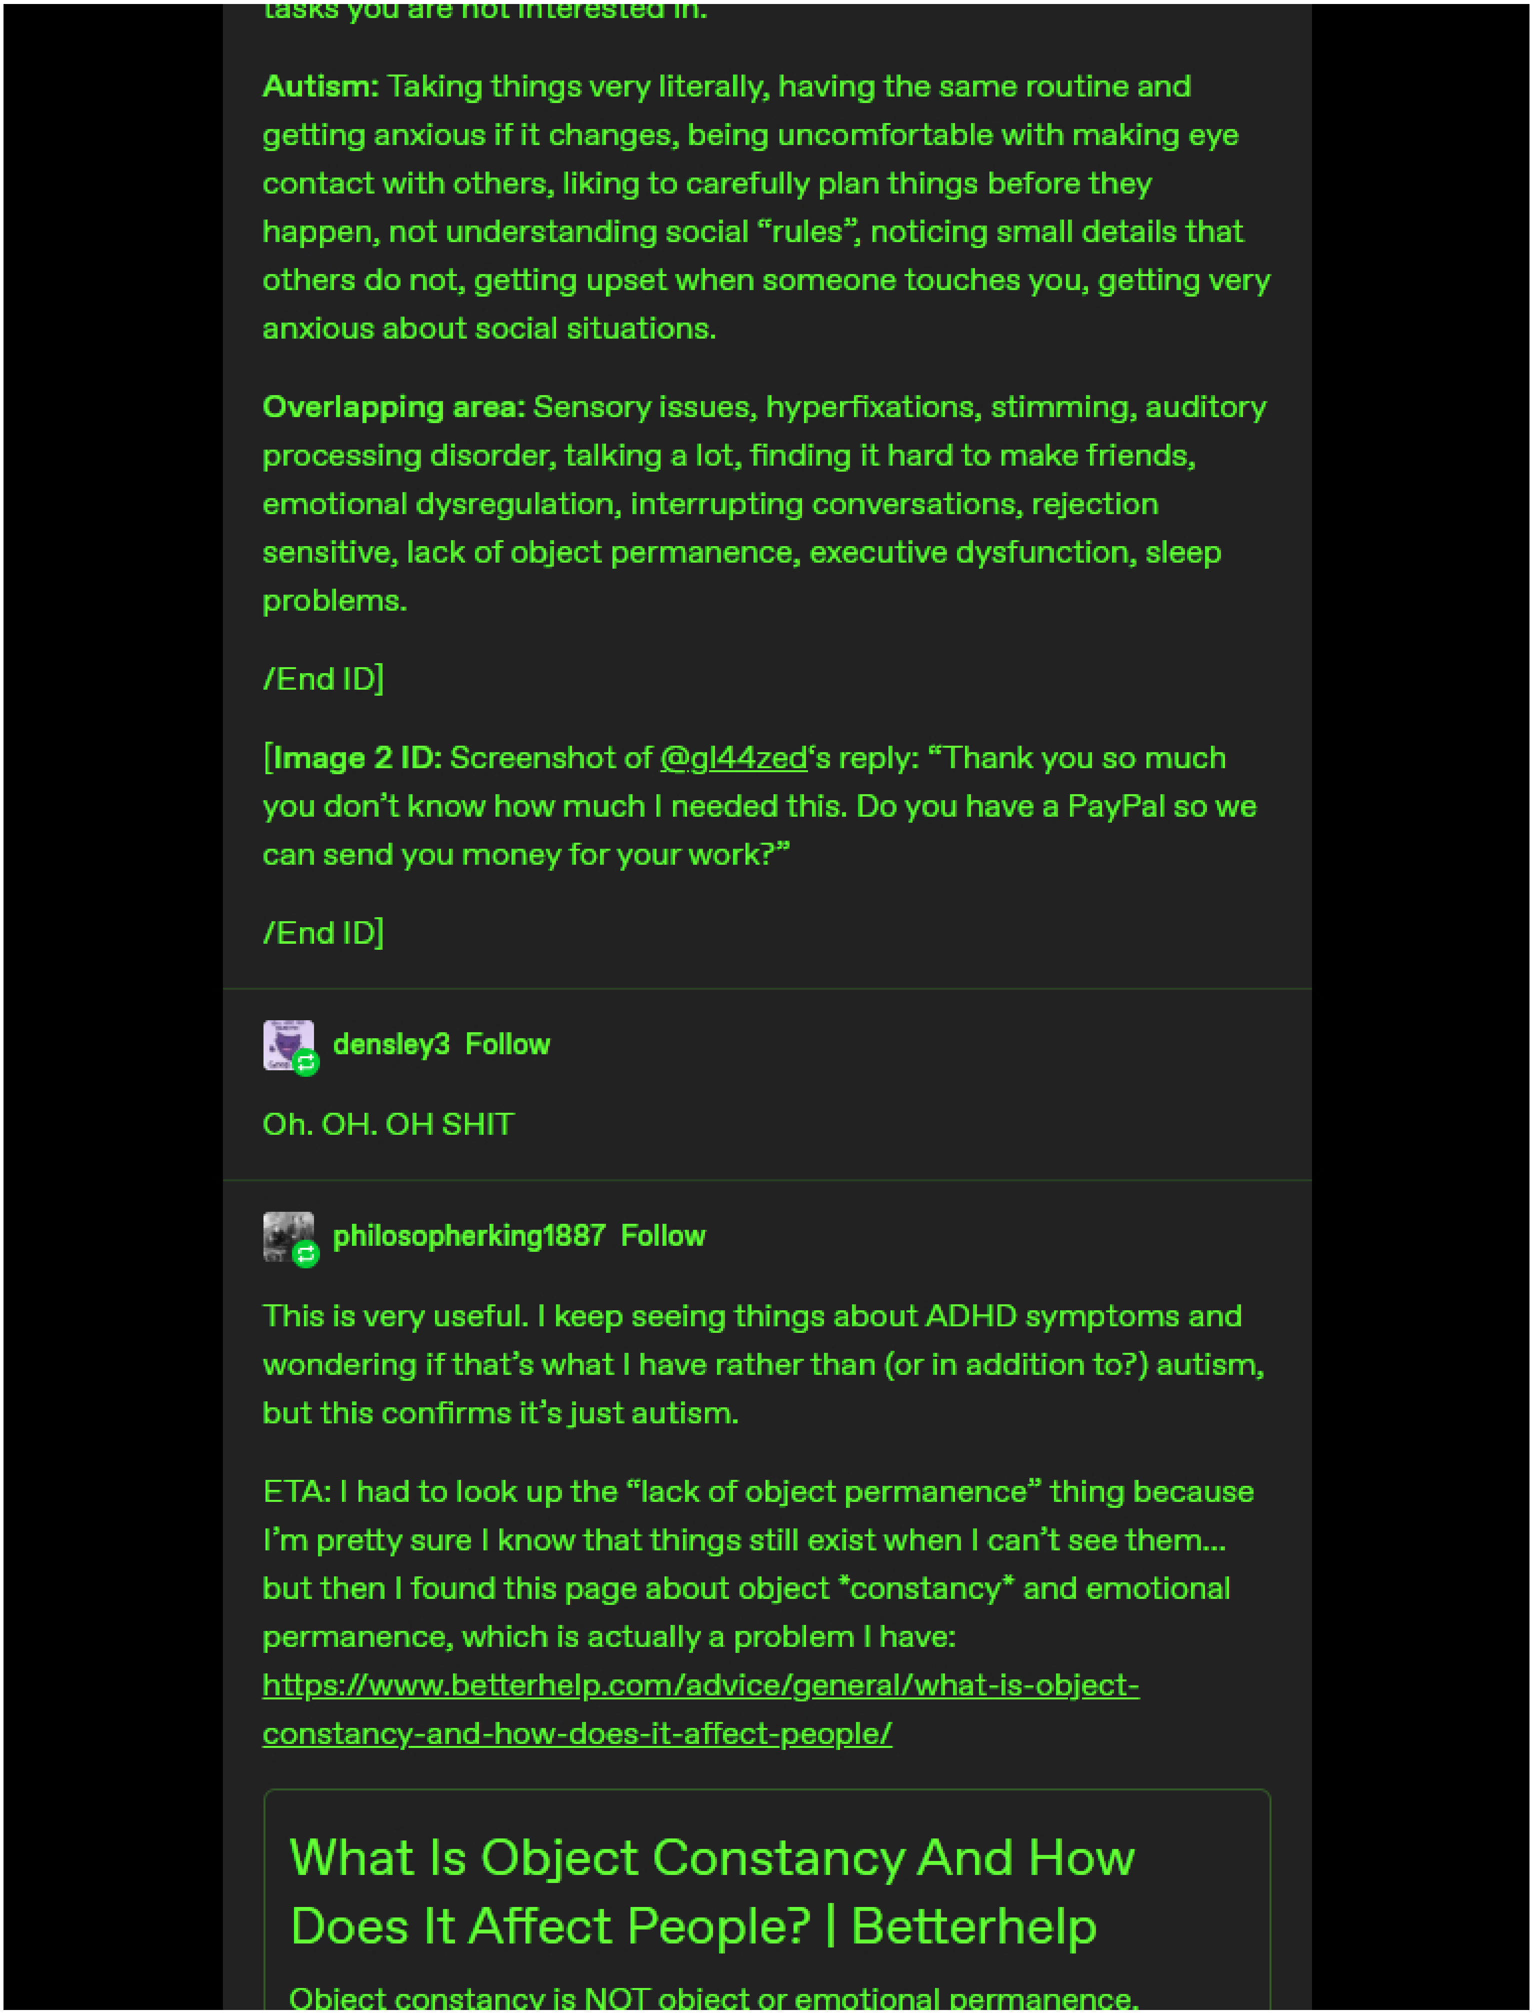
ADHD: Impulsivity, short attention span, poor working memory, poor planning skills, time blindness, depression when understimulated, little sense of danger, making careless mistakes, no motivation for tasks you are not interested in.



tasks you are not interested in.

Autism: Taking things very literally, having the same routine and getting anxious if it changes, being uncomfortable with making eye contact with others, liking to carefully plan things before they happen, not understanding social "rules", noticing small details that others do not, getting upset when someone touches you, getting very anxious about social situations.

Overlapping area: Sensory issues, hyperfixations, stimming, auditory processing disorder, talking a lot, finding it hard to make friends, emotional dysregulation, interrupting conversations, rejection sensitive, lack of object permanence, executive dysfunction, sleep problems.

I personally wanna see less 'you are not a burden/it's not work to love you' and more 'you are worth the work it takes to love you.' I KNOW I'm a burden sometimes. that isn't such a terrible thing! humans are strong. we can carry burdens. and it is work for me to be there for my friends, but it's work I'm willing to do.

we need to acknowledge this because pretending love isn't work will never make people like me feel less guilty for accepting love. we need to talk about it so people don't feel bad for having boundaries and not always being up to do the work. we need to accept it so we can properly appreciate what others do for us and what we're doing for them.

yes it does take work to love you. but guess what? you still deserve love, and you deserve people who are willing to do the work to love you. it doesn't make you bad. all love take work. and everyone is worth it.

Human ankles don't normally work like that!

I can squat like this, but I cannot maintain it as I have a spinal deformity and this position causes my back a fuckton of pain.

bonesofthepast Follow

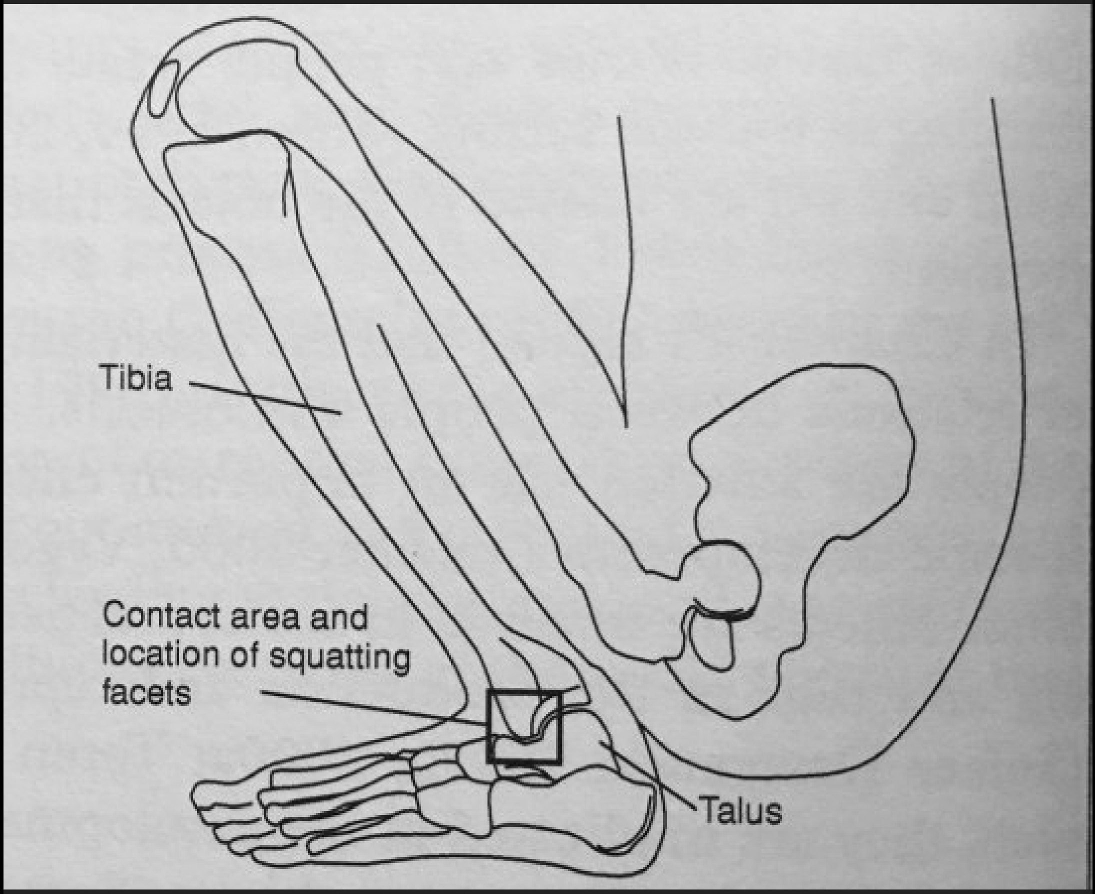
Let's hear it for

SQUATTING FACETS!

They are in fact the #1 thing that got me interested in:

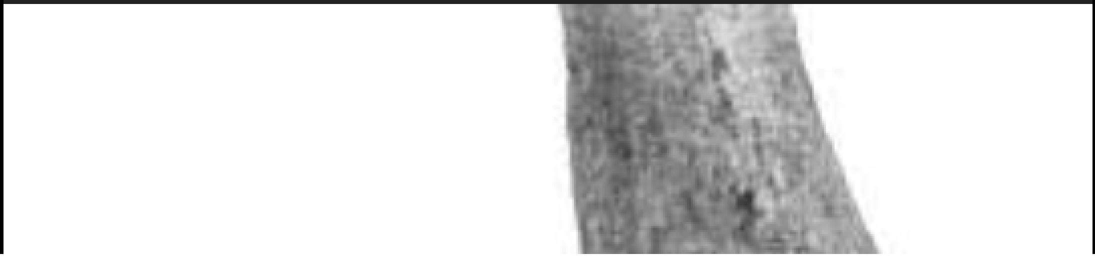
- Anthropology
- Physical anthropology
- Forensic anthropology
- The archaeology class I was in at the time*

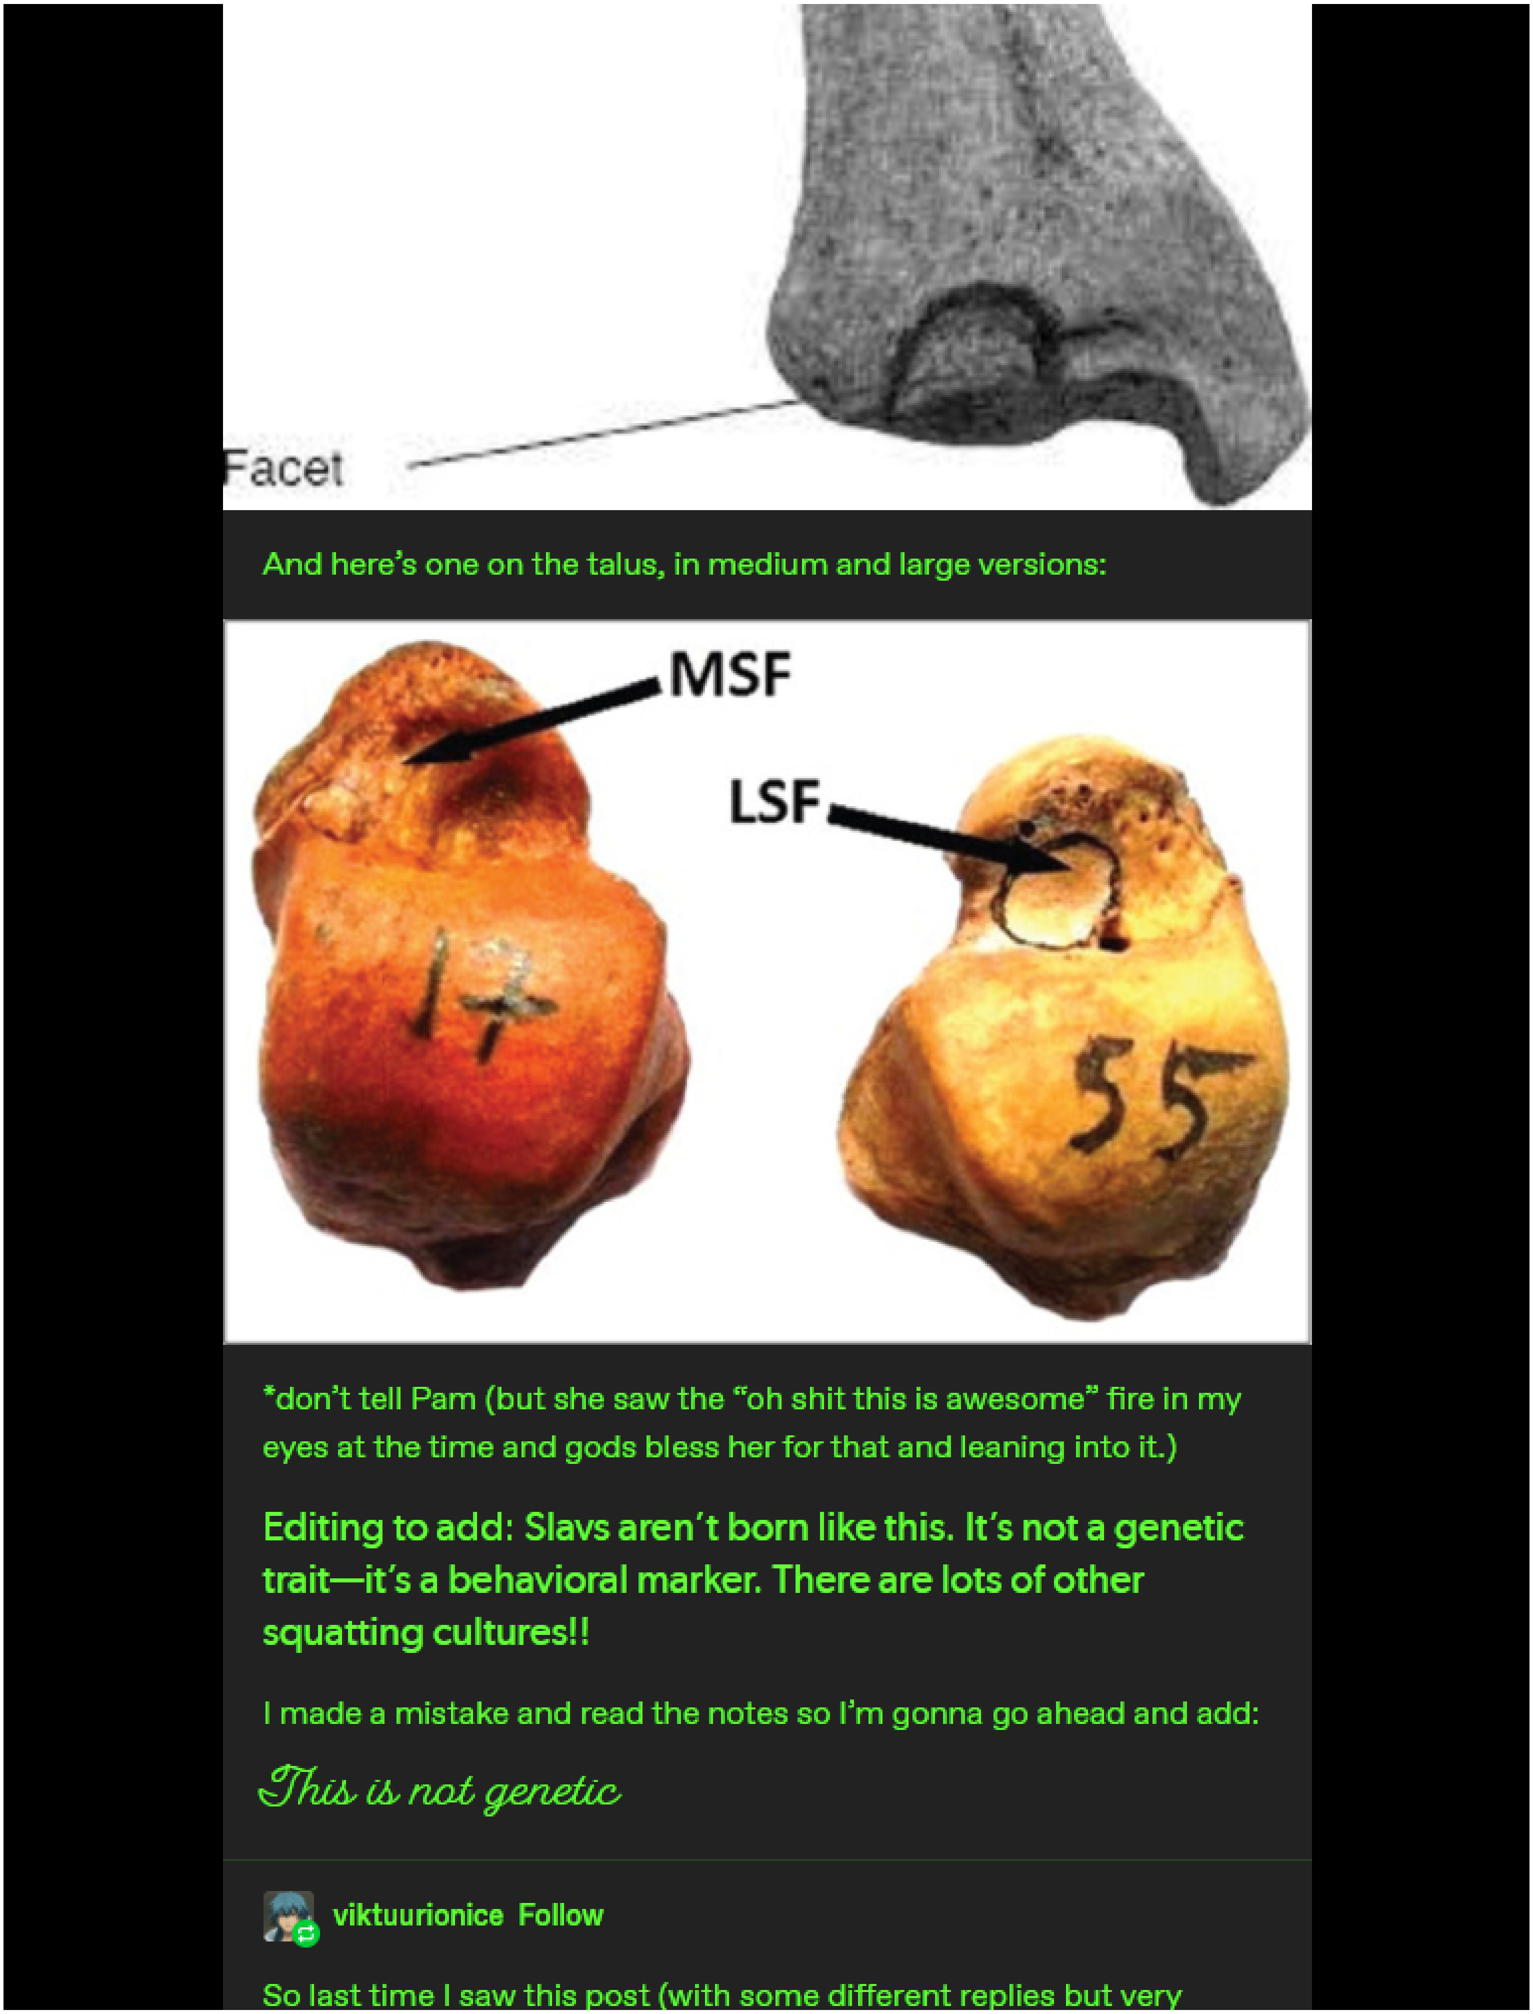
So here's a squatting person from the side:



This here, the point of contact between the talus and the tibia. Squatting like this culturally—ie, it's the default way you sit—leaves evidence on your talus, tibia, and hips (the acetabulum or hip socket). The fact that we can see literal evidence for the different ways people live their everyday lives—not just how they got murdered or what stuff they had—blew me away when I was 3 days into college and it still does today.

Here is one on the tibia:





And here's one on the talus, in medium and large versions:

*don't tell Pam (but she saw the "oh shit this is awesome" fire in my eyes at the time and gods bless her for that and leaning into it.)

Editing to add: Slavs aren't born like this. It's not a genetic trait—it's a behavioral marker. There are lots of other squatting cultures!!

I made a mistake and read the notes so I'm gonna go ahead and add:

This is not genetic

viktuurionice Follow

So last time I saw this post (with some different replies but very similar gist) I got curious IF I COULD slav squat. I could get close but not quite and after a few months of trying to work my way to a flat footed squat I can now do it comfortably. It's not genetic and if you're not quite there you can indeed work up to it. So yeah… not genetic. More behavioral and flexibility related than anything.

You too can learn to slav squat

For me, the most important part of Aang's character is the most uncomfortable. Selfishness.

As I've matured, what was once a blemish on an otherwise perfect show has become something else entirely. The deus ex machina in the final battle, where Aang gets pressed against a sharp rock that releases his closed off chakra and unlocks the Avatar State, always felt like a cop out to me as a kid: the narrative itself recognizing that the only way for Aang's philosophy to hold water was to make up a tenuous solution.

What I now realize is that this is the whole point. Avatar Yangchen told Aang, point blank, that he should kill Ozai because his duty as the Avatar, his duty to the world, outweighs his duty to his people.

Aang doesn't care.

Aang refuses to accept that his own people's way of life was wrong. He refuses to accept the notion that his people were ignorant, that their ways were insufficient, and he refuses to go with another culture's way. Yangchen could eschew her responsibility to her culture because her culture was still there. Aang was the only Air Nomad left. For him to resolve this conflict that started over a hundred years ago with an act of murder would be a blatant blaspheme to everything his people stood for, and he could never revive their culture. Ever. It would die with him.

Aang was willing to let the Earth Kingdom burn to the ground.

To prove that his people didn't deserve the same.

A commonly referenced piece of insight from the fan community is the fact that the room where Aang finds Monk Gyatso's skeleton, there are five suits of Fire Nation armor limp on the ground as well. The theory being that Gyatso used all of his bending prowess to suck the air out of the room and kill them.

I think he did.

When the Southern Air Temple was raised, the Air Nomads met the Fire Nation at their game.

Aang, resolute, refused to reach out his hand the same way.

And the universe itself respected that.

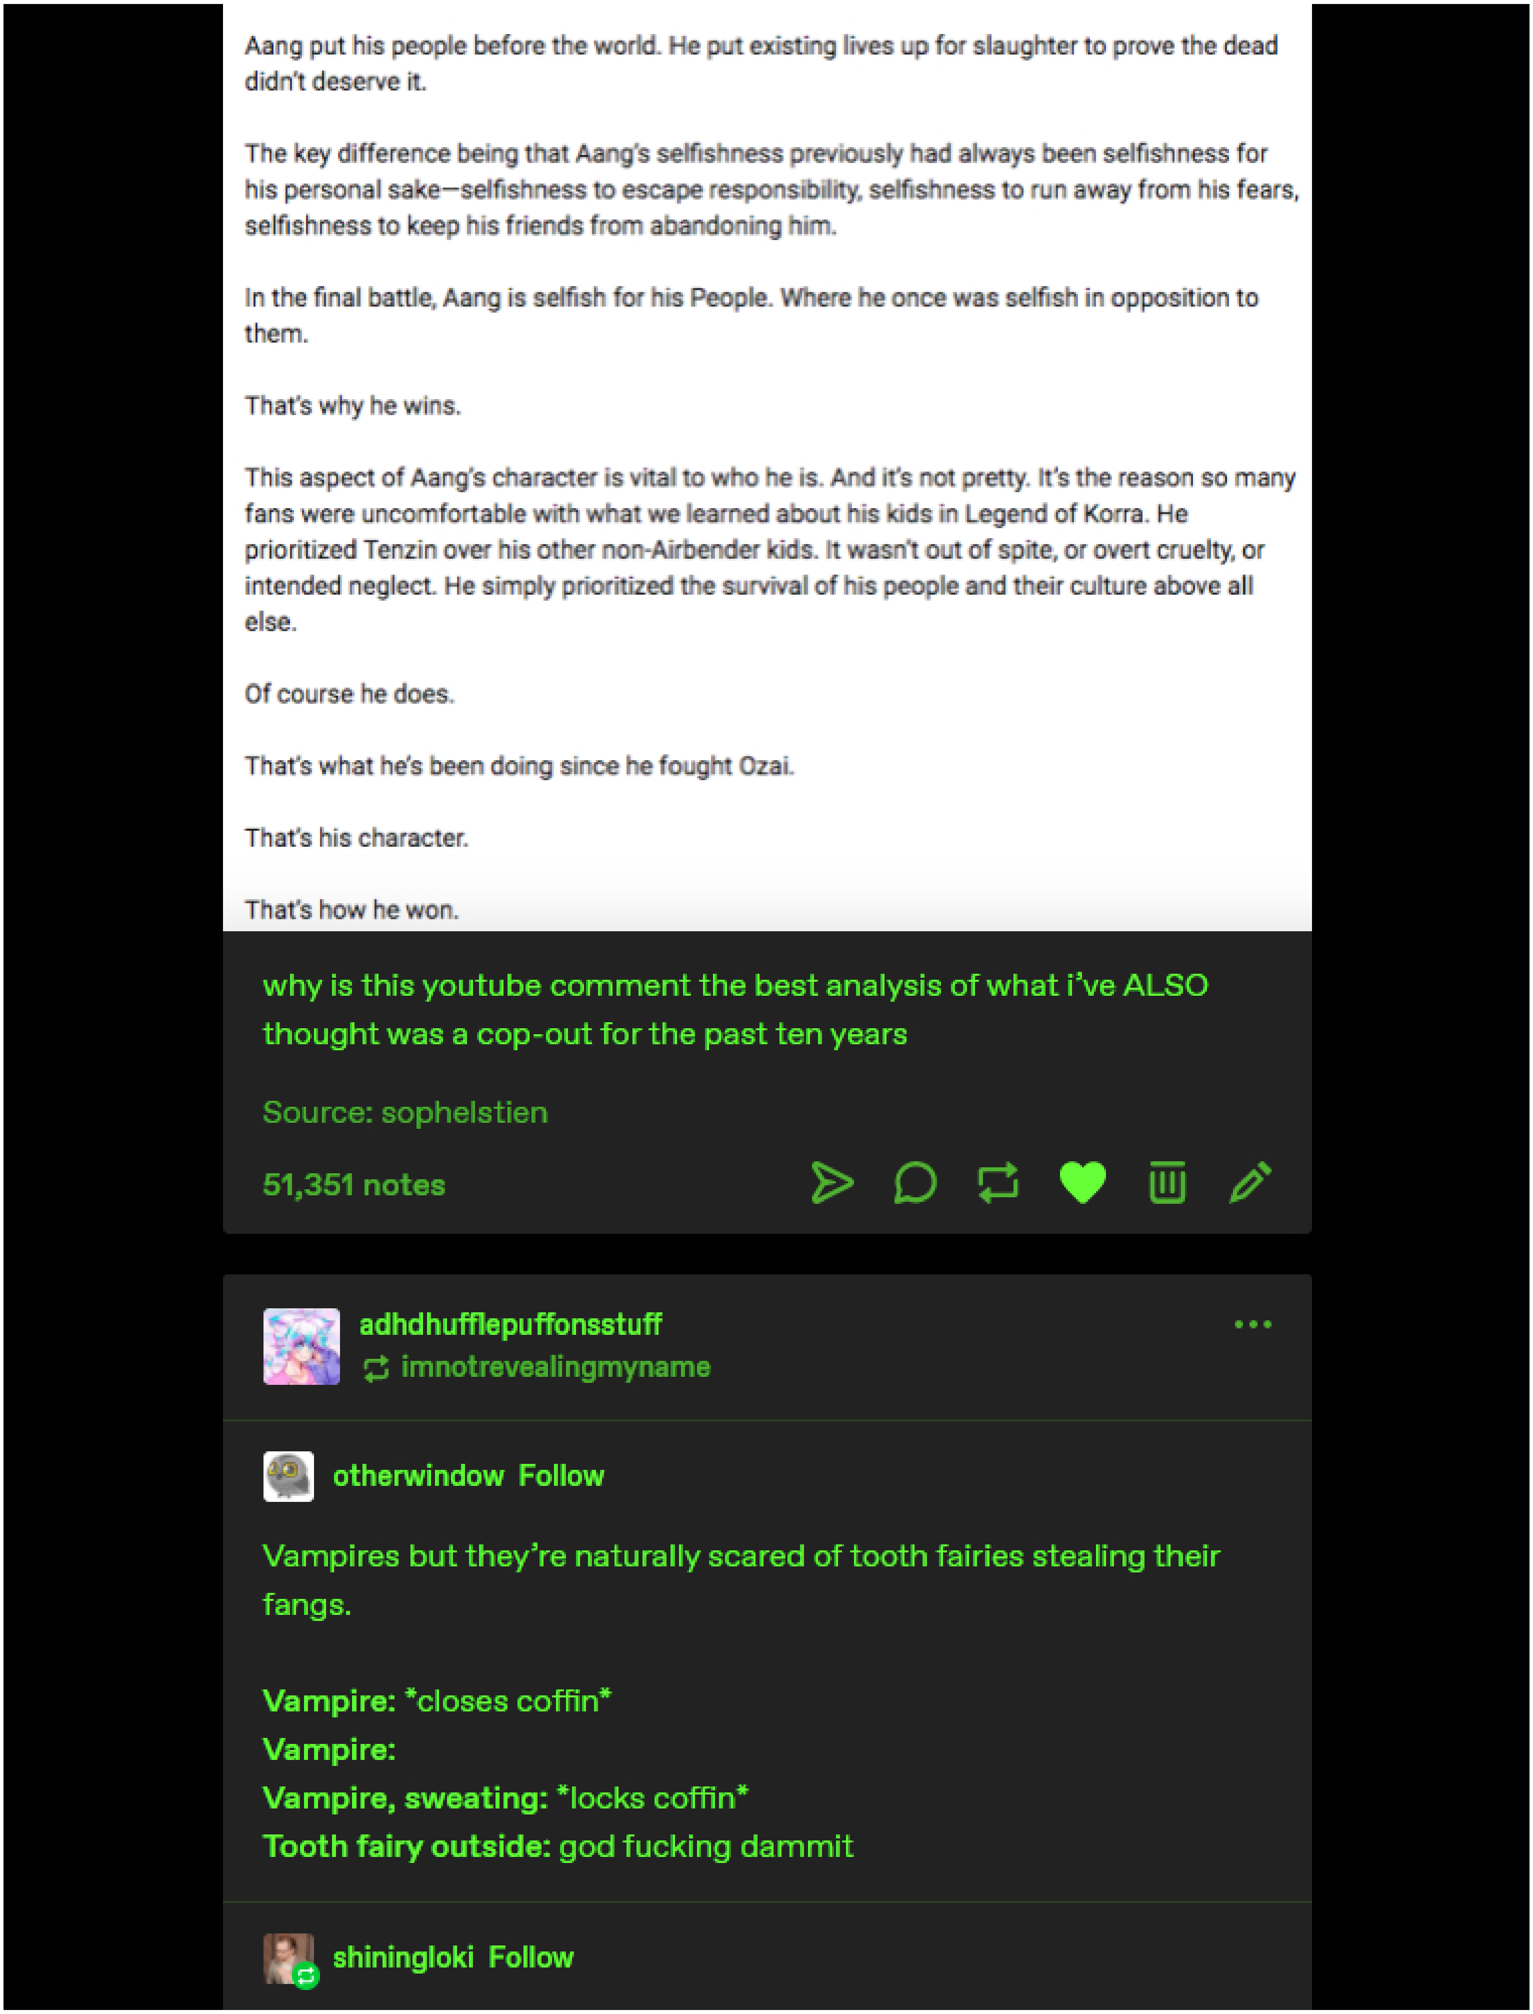
This is symbolized in color when Aang uses energybending to remove Ozai's firebending. The red from Ozai overtakes Aang's entire body until all that remains is the skin of Aang's eyelid. The Fire Nation's moral depravity consumed Air Nomad culture and philosophy and belief. Then, right at the end, right when every single piece of it has been corrupted and dead.

Aang.

Pushing forward, resolute, and overtaking Ozai with blue.

The universe respected Aang's conviction and allowed him to win.

And that is selfish.



Aang put his people before the world. He put existing lives up for slaughter to prove the dead didn't deserve it.

The key difference being that Aang's selfishness previously had always been selfishness for his personal sake—selfishness to escape responsibility, selfishness to run away from his fears, selfishness to keep his friends from abandoning him.

In the final battle, Aang is selfish for his People. Where he once was selfish in opposition to them.

That's why he wins.

This aspect of Aang's character is vital to who he is. And it's not pretty. It's the reason so many fans were uncomfortable with what we learned about his kids in Legend of Korra. He prioritized Tenzin over his other non-Airbender kids. It wasn't out of spite, or overt cruelty, or intended neglect. He simply prioritized the survival of his people and their culture above all else.

Of course he does.

That's what he's been doing since he fought Ozai.

That's his character.

That's how he won.

Minneapolis Will Pay Influencers to 'De-Escalate' Tension During Derek Chauvin Trial

City officials voted to pay social media influencers $2,000 to spread the city's messaging during the trial of the officer who...

Minneapolis City Council told CBSN Minnesota in a statement that the goal is "to increase access to information to communities that do not typically follow mainstream news sources or City communications channels and/or who do not consume information in English. It's also an opportunity to create more two-way communication between the City and communities."

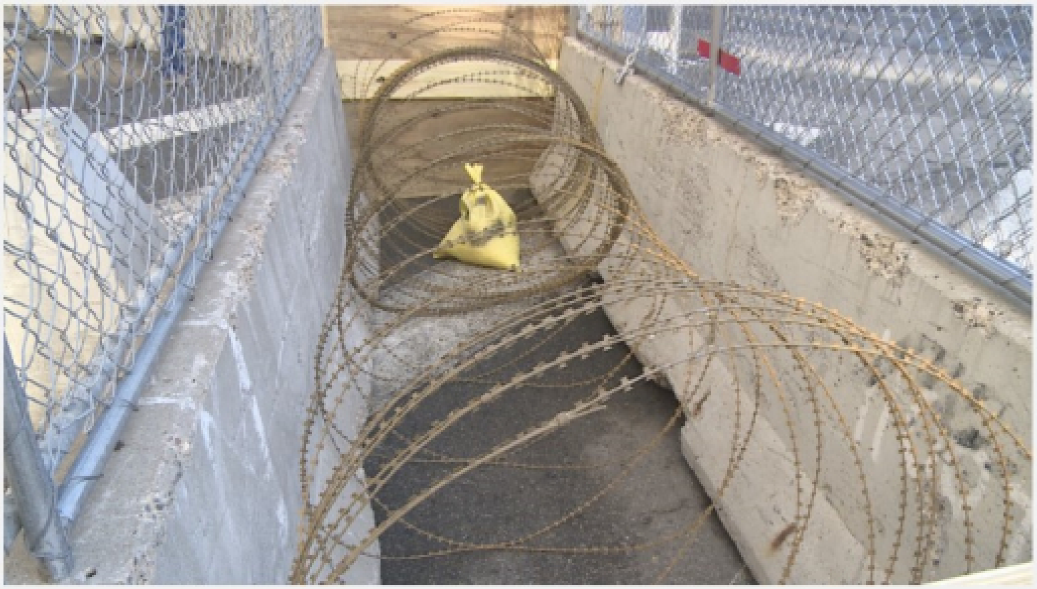
During the trial most of the Hennepin County Government Center will be closed off to the public, but the city is setting up two "demonstration zones" where people can safely gather to protest.

you must only protest the government in the government allotted protest zones

According to KARE11 News, "The area around the Hennepin County Courthouse is starting to look like a war zone now that the [courthouse] plaza is surrounded by metal fencing and concrete barriers."

Here's a cross-section of those barriers:



KARE-11

bonus: they arent being subtle saturnine-powerbomb Follow

This illustrates a point that I desperately want to drive home about the situation in Minneapolis ever since the first protests went off:

Militarization is becoming the new normal in the Twin Militarization is becoming the new normal in the Twin Cities.

Ever since the initial uprising, State Patrol and National Guard have been getting deployed with increased frequency. National Guard units were deployed twice, the second time taking only 2 hours for troops to be mobilized in Minneapolis. They rolled in riding IFVs - what are essentially light tanks designed for urban combat. They've been threatened to deploy more than once following those instances. We were having a hard time telling if National Guard was deployed or not during the first day or two of the uprising because State Patrol was deploying in full Multicam battle rattle and riding MRAPs. They wouldn't identify themselves when people asked. Surrounding the inauguration, what was functionally a DMZ was established a couple blocks around the state capitol in St. Paul. Travel in the area was seriously restricted and similar barricades were manned by state patrol. Reaper drones and helicopters have been deployed at basically any protest that has more than a couple dozen people. It's Going Down got their hands on some of the footage from that, if I remember correctly.

Things are getting really fucked up here and it's actually kind of hard to get the word out. News sources aren't talking about the finer details of it much, aside from activist publications like It's Going Down. I just really want folks to know how bad things are looking and keep us in mind.

yosemitedopelake

Hey y'all, this is basic urban counter-insurgency. This is police taking lessons learned in yugoslavia, Vietnam, malaya, indonesia, philippines, Iraq, and afghanistan etc. and applying them to american cities. To you.

saturnine-powerbomb

That's the thing that I think people need to be aware of. What the police see in this past year is an insurgency either waiting to happen, or just beginning to happen, so they're being particularly heavy-handed and militaristic in how they're handling things around here. I'm worried that people are going to get killed by police around the trial because of the way police are about three degrees of escalation ahead of the people at any given time. The kind of security strategies and language they're using seem like they think there's an organized force in the twin cities that's going to strike an objective. They really see themselves as an occupying force.

WandaVision surprise cameo thoughts

At first my money would have been on Dr. Strange, seems the most likely.

But with that apparently debunked (don't know how much truth there is to this), I started thinking about my next cameo choice: Loki.

There have been a couple of references here and there, such as the 'Nexus' connection to Nexus Beings and the TVA, the allusions to Mephisto, young Wanda and Pietro talking about 'mischief', the scepter and so on.

But I kept thinking why would the TVA send Loki to Westview?

I've thought perhaps to just observe but whoever the cameo is, according to Paul Bettany, has multiple scenes with Vision so there must be some involvement. (Unless of course, he was referring to scenes with White Vision in which case I have no idea).

I kept thinking.

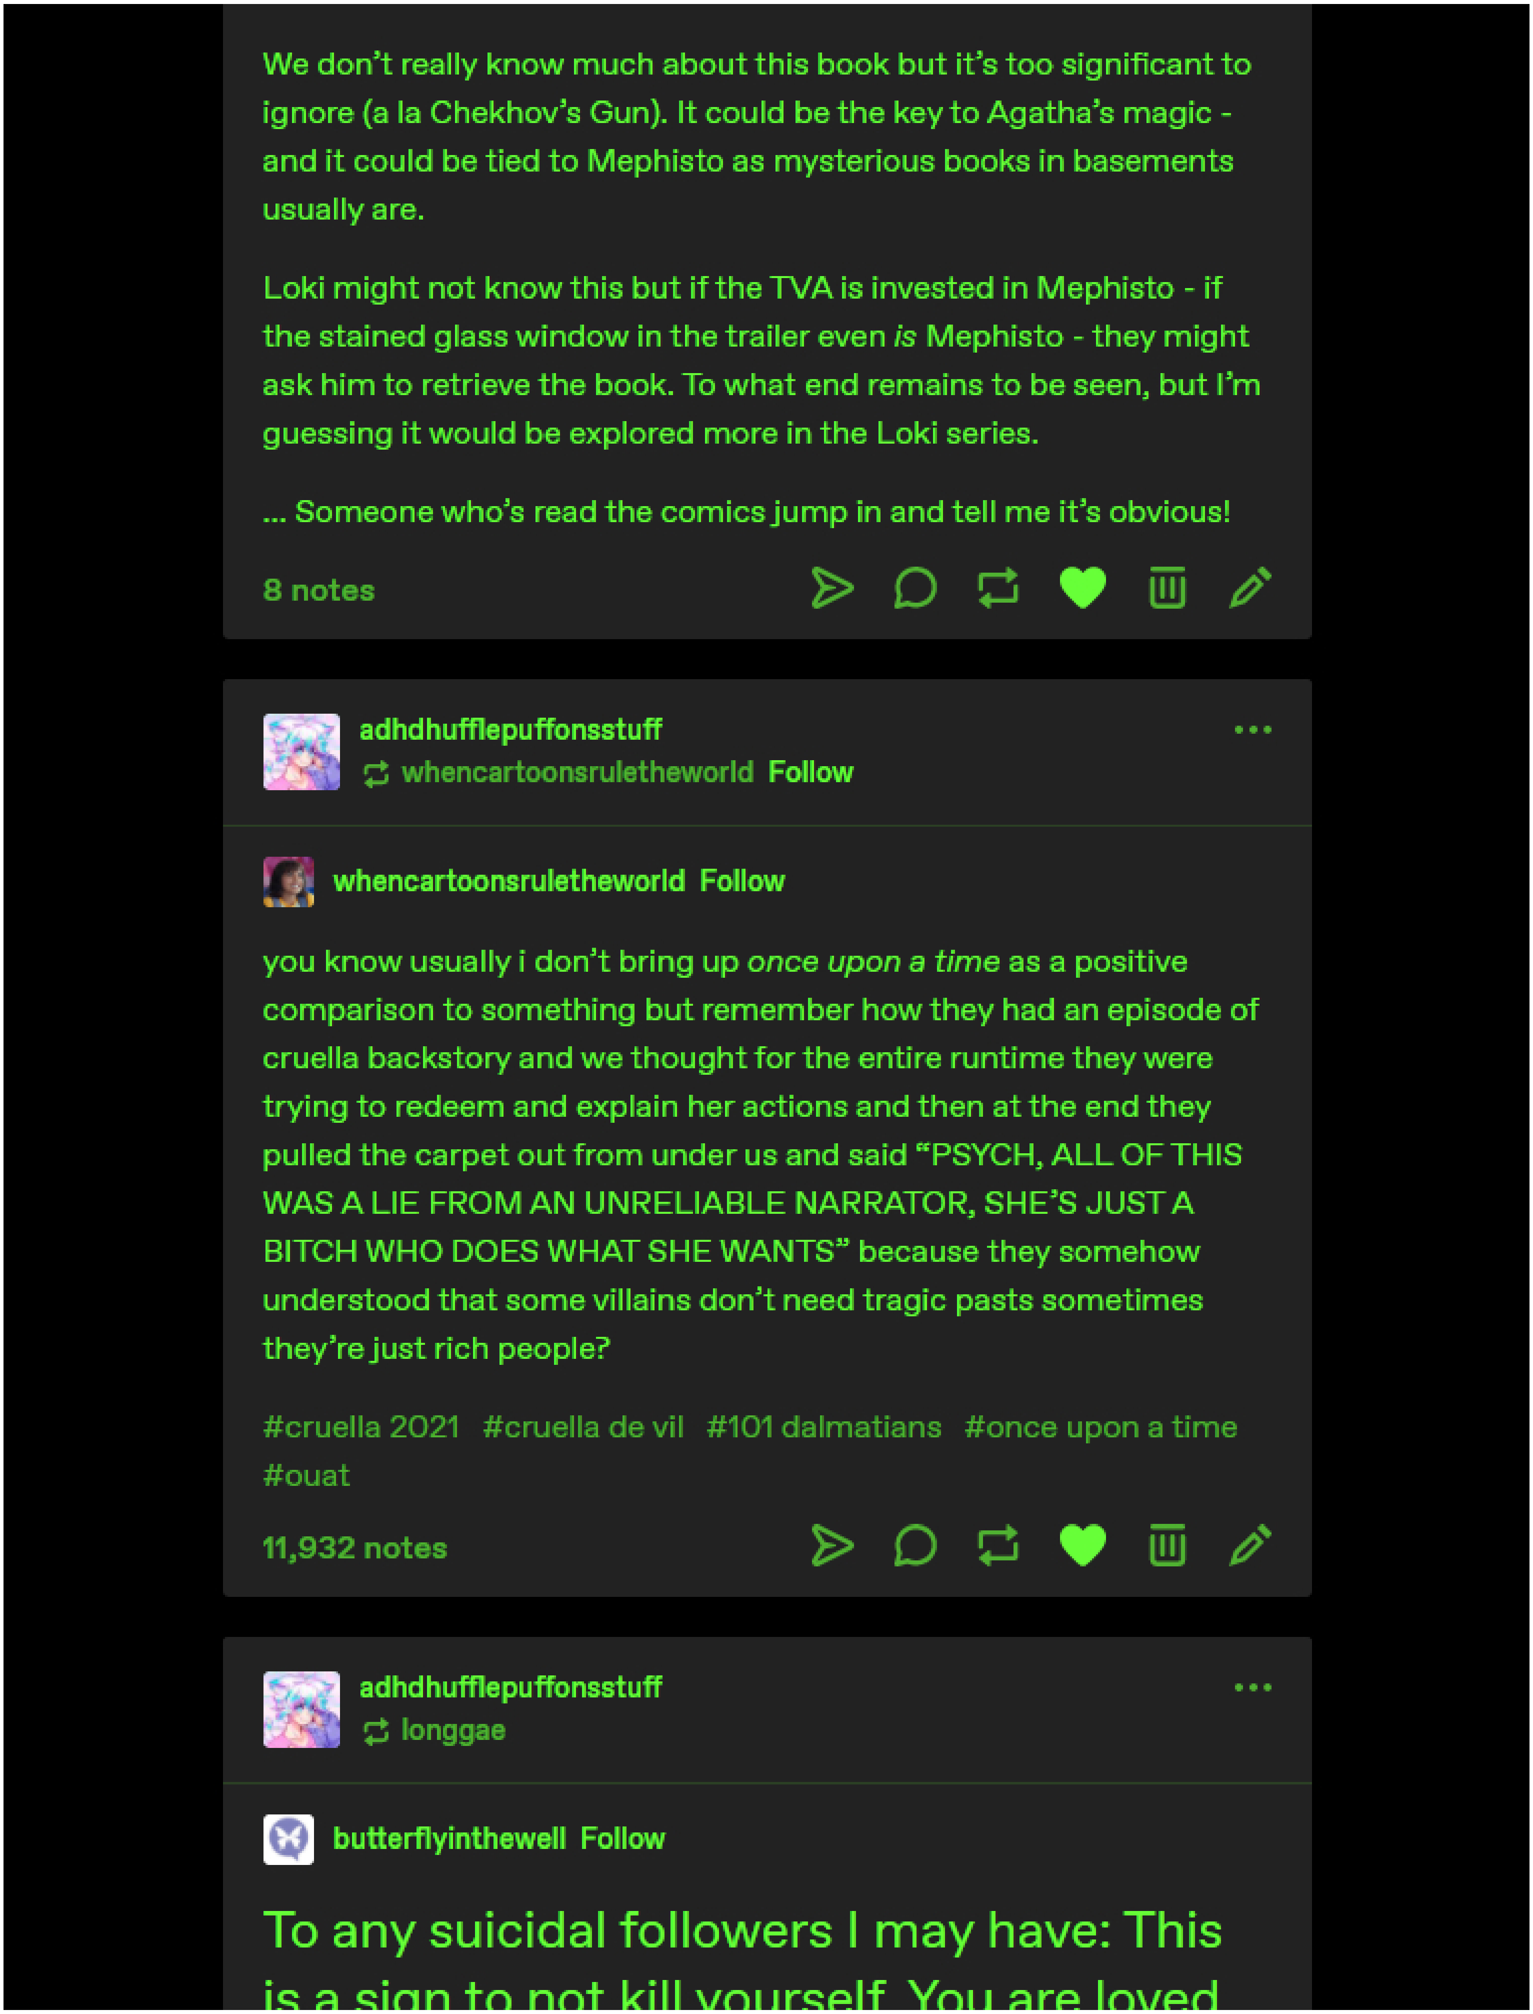
Maybe it's to stop Wanda and dispel the reality she created.

It could be even protect Wanda from Agatha.

If Pietro really is from a different universe and not just a creation by Agatha, Loki might be tasked with putting him back in his own reality.

Then it could also be to bring Agatha in to stop her meddling.

Or more specifically, (as my brain finally made this connection) to confiscate Agatha's book.



We don't really know much about this book but it's too significant to ignore (a la Chekhov's Gun). It could be the key to Agatha's magic - and it could be tied to Mephisto as mysterious books in basements usually are.

Loki might not know this but if the TVA is invested in Mephisto - if the stained glass window in the trailer even is Mephisto - they might ask him to retrieve the book. To what end remains to be seen, but I'm guessing it would be explored more in the Loki series.

... Someone who's read the comics jump in and tell me it's obvious!

A lot of people don't know about this, and so they think that I don't care enough to listen to what their saying (which I do!!! I just can't remember it) or that I'm lazy because of all the things I don't end up doing because I forgot I had to do them.
- Lack of motivation. Listen, I honestly can't do anything on my own for the most part. I have to have someone else tell me to do something or have them set goals for me because it's so damn difficult for me to do it myself. Again, I'm not lazy, I just have trouble doing things on my own - Language processing difficulties. Sometimes, English and words in general don't work out in my head. Reading or even listening to someone talk can be extremely difficult for me to understand because my brain just won't work. Why? Can't tell you 99% of the time! It's not that I need to focus, it's that my brain is just buffering.
- Needing multiple forms of stimulation at all times. I have a tin of putty that I keep in my book bag and a smaller one I keep in my purse at all times because of this reason. If I want to learn anything at school, I have to be able to look at something, hear something, and have something to do with my hands. Otherwise, it's probably a big nope for me. What's frustrating is that since this isn't talked about enough, I often get called childish or get looked down upon because I have to play with silly putty in a highschool class.
- Hyperfixation. Adhd can mean not being able to focus, but it's also focusing too much on something! This can mean anything from a certain interest someone is in to at that moment, to something like a song that has been stuck in your head for a week. People seem to not understand this and think that we're boring and have nothing else to talk about or that we're annoying because we keep bringing the same things up over and over again but that's not the case. Trust me, I'm annoyed with the hit or miss song too, but at least it's not playing in your head constantly like it is for me

These are all the ones I can think of right now, but it's really important we talk about this stuff more. All of these things that come with adhd can be very frustrating for those around us because they don't understand that we can't help it. To an outsider, it may just look like a person with adhd is just lazy and doesn't care, when it's actually just how our brains are wired. None of us want to be frustrating to others!! In fact, all of this frustrates us too!! But since adhd is just known as "not being able to focus", people don't realize what all comes with it and how it can really fuck everyone over.

Please add more if you can think of anything else!! I'm horrible with lists lol

adhdaiden

- RSD (Rejection Sensitive Dysphoria) is also a fairly common experience of ppl with adhd! RSD is an extreme emotional sensitivity caused by the perception of failing, or being rejected, mocked, or criticised. (key word: perception. the feelings of rejection/failure aren't always very rational). it seems to not get enough attention, even in discussions about neurodivergency, which rlly sucks b/c it's a very painful thing to experience... it often also comes with suicidal ideation, and since not a lot of people know what it is, in some cases it's misdiagnosed as serious mood disorders like bpd or bipolar :-(

quininthecIouds Follow

^^^ I was gonna add RSD, glad someone else did! Also (this is long and I know I left a lot out/probably messed up but I don't have the brain rn to proofread and these are Important):

- shit... I had some stuff to add, I promise, I can't remember
- ummm ugh I really did though
- oh! Oh yeah!

ADHD is an executive function deficit disorder (EFDD)

A lot of the below points are related/connected to executive dysfunction, bc it's such a huge part of our brain structure, even with the help of meds. Strap in for some psychology fun, folks!

- Our Limbic System: it's like a Boggart - terrifying, in constant flux, and absolutely ridikkulus.

  1. Amygdala chaos. Our amygdalas (part of limbic system in brain that regulates fight/flight/freeze) operate at extremes. This ties in with RSD a lot cause it can cause us to "overreact" with anger, despair, intense fear/panic, and/or a sort of paralysis that makes it near impossible to deal with difficult situations
  2. Messed-up reward centers. We don't "procrastinate" so much as we just don't have the natural function to self-motivate. Also, impatience.
  3. Hippocampus - in charge of memory & auditory processing
  4. Wernicke's area - responsible for speech comprehension
  5. Broca's area - responsible for producing speech
  6. Basal ganglia - habit-learning and forming, schedule, routine

- ADHD symptoms aren't selective. People often say stuff like "if it was important you'd remember" or "you can focus on things you enjoy, so clearly you CAN focus and just choose not to." Um, no. Symptoms can apply to anything. Even stuff we really care about we can forget or fail to get up the motivation for.
- Hypersensitivity - we can get sensory overload easily, or have way too little stimulus, both of which impair almost all functioning
- Sleep problems. Our options are insomnia, hypersomnia, or oscillating wildly between the two.
- Neurotransmitters hate us! :) Too much, too little, too unregulated, synapse issues, you name it

  1. Norepinephrine - Oh, norepinephrine... please return from the war. This is the Big One. The thing that first comes up when talking about ADHD in the brain. It's in charge of motivation, stress/excitability/reactionary regulation, attention, memory storage and retrieval, alertness, maintaining focus and task endurance, processing sensory information, priority-setting, intentional behavior, thought-organization, executive functioning involved in reasoning, learning, and problem solving, etc.
  2. Dopamine - our reward centers are messed up. It takes a LOT more for us to get a dopamine boost, and even then it's much lower and duller than neurotypicals get. Exercise, food, whatever it is - it isn't nearly as effective for us when it comes to depression/anxiety/mood problems in general. It can help, but not in the same way.

3. Serotonin - influences mood, social behavior, sleep, and memory.

- Basically our frontal lobes are little shits (emphasis on little... they're small) You know, the part of the brain that does that thing called ~Executive Functioning?~
- Goal-oriented tasks - we often can't just do something simply bc it needs to be done. That's not enough.
- Delayed gratification - doesn't process unless instant results/rewards/consequences
- Our perception of time is WAY off - either something is Now, or it's Not Now and therefore waaaay in the future or past. If a project is due in a month, it will Always be a month away even the day prior to the due date. If I look at the clock and it's 12pm, it will Be 12pm until I look at a clock again, even if I know it's been a while since then
- Impulse control - again with not understanding the concept of long-term. We also don't inherently understand mood regulation or how to handle outbursts
- Social behavior - uh, yeah. That can be hard. Sometimes we're completely unaware of our surroundings and how we're acting, but then sometimes RSD and social anxiety kick in and we become hyper-aware of every nugget of body language, tone, expression, etc., interpreting everything as negative (I'm making them uncomfortable, they hate me, I'm being weird, I'm stressful to be around, they coughed probably as a sign I should stop doing something. Or start? Oh no.) We blurt stuff out even if it's totally unrelated or unhelpful, lots of times when we know we shouldn't but we just? can't help it??
- Decision-making - hahahaha yep. remember fight/flight/freeze? Yeah this is "freeze's" favorite place to butt in. Either our minds go blank and we cannot think of any options, or it's exploding with Too Many possibilities to think through properly. This usually results in doing nothing, panicking, or crap what was the last one I was gonna say?? Oh right the impulse control thing again - we just do Something without foresight. Which brings us to
- planning - thinking ahead is hard enough. We CAN plan and be good at it, but sticking with it is super difficult. Which is obnoxious bc being on a schedule in some way is known to be helpful for ADHD... oof.
- Initiating, following through on, and switching between tasks. A lot of the time we honestly don't know how to start something, or even how to go about thinking about starting something. I can't think enough right now to fill this one out but you get it.

- Working Memory: The ability to hold things in your mind. HAHAHA unless it's something lodged in there for months there's no telling if I can remember anything
- Comorbid Disorders - Because of the way our brains are structures and how they function, ADHD has a SUPER high comorbitity rate, meaning there are often more disorders at play. For instance, ADHD nearly always comes with built-in depression and anxiety. Ppl with ADHD have higher likelihoods than the general population to also have: bipolar (type I or II, cyclothymia, dysmithia, rapid-cycling, etc.), OCD, BPD (ADHDers can have BPD as well, but it IS often misdiagnosed because of how similar it is to RSD), dyslexia, eating disorders, etc. Many ADHD symptoms are shared by/overlap with other things inherently, even without separate diagnoses, like being prone to chronic sadness or feelings of worthlessness, inability to regulate emotion, etc.

ADHD IS A REAL DISORDER THAT GOES WAY BEYOND WHAT YOU THINK

I know we ADHD peeps have trouble reading lots of text at once, so

TL;DR: AAAAAAAAHHHHHHHH!!??!?!!!??!!!

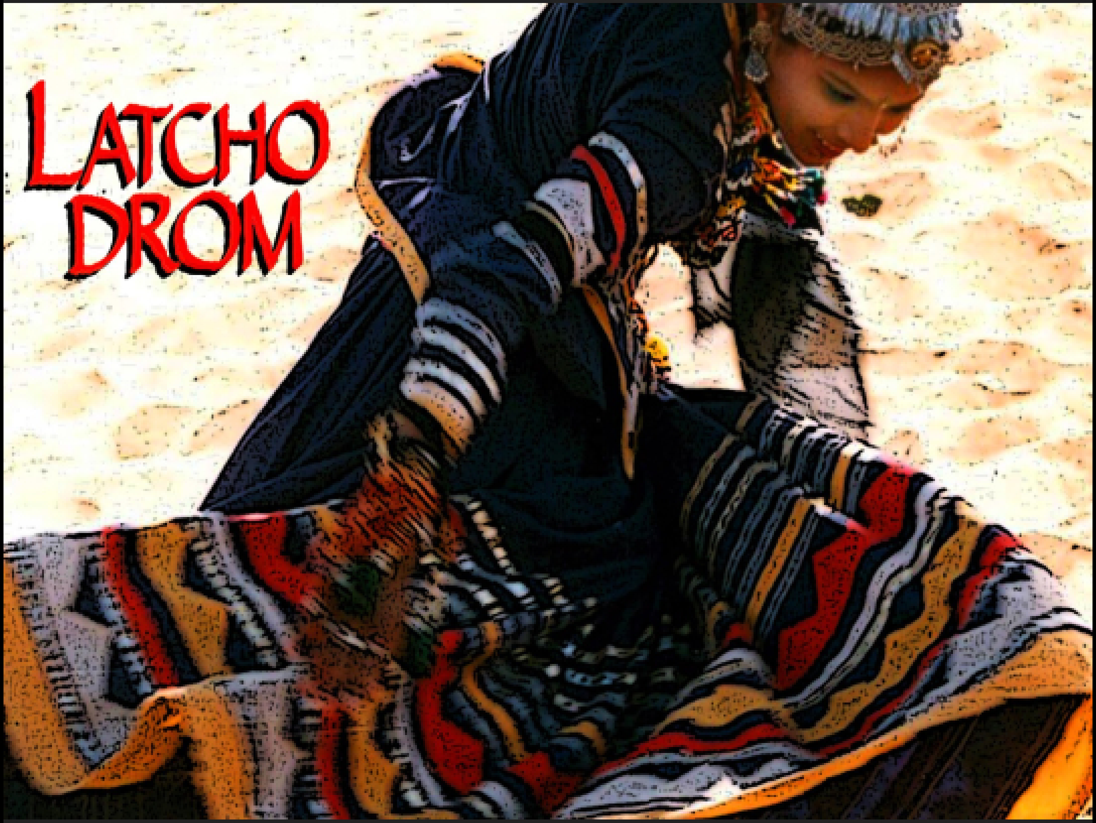
10 Ways to Appreciate Romani Culture

1. Attend a Festival

Festivals are a great way to partake in a culture different from your own. Romani people have numerous festivals throughout the year many of which are open events and welcoming to non-Roma participants. Festivals, such as the Appleby Horse Fair, Khamoro, and the California Herdeljezi Festival, are all great examples of open cultural events that allow you to actively participate in aspects of Romani culture.

For a list of some more Romani festivals, click here!

2. Consume Romani Media



Romani media is completely underrated. There are a plethora of great producers, actors, musicians, and radio personalities who are ethnic Roma. Consuming media is one way we can actively engage with and learn about another culture without being disrespectful.

For a list of Romani media, click here!

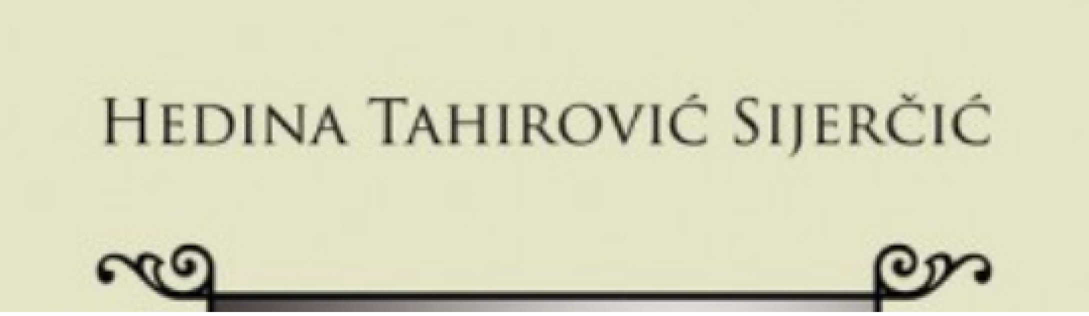
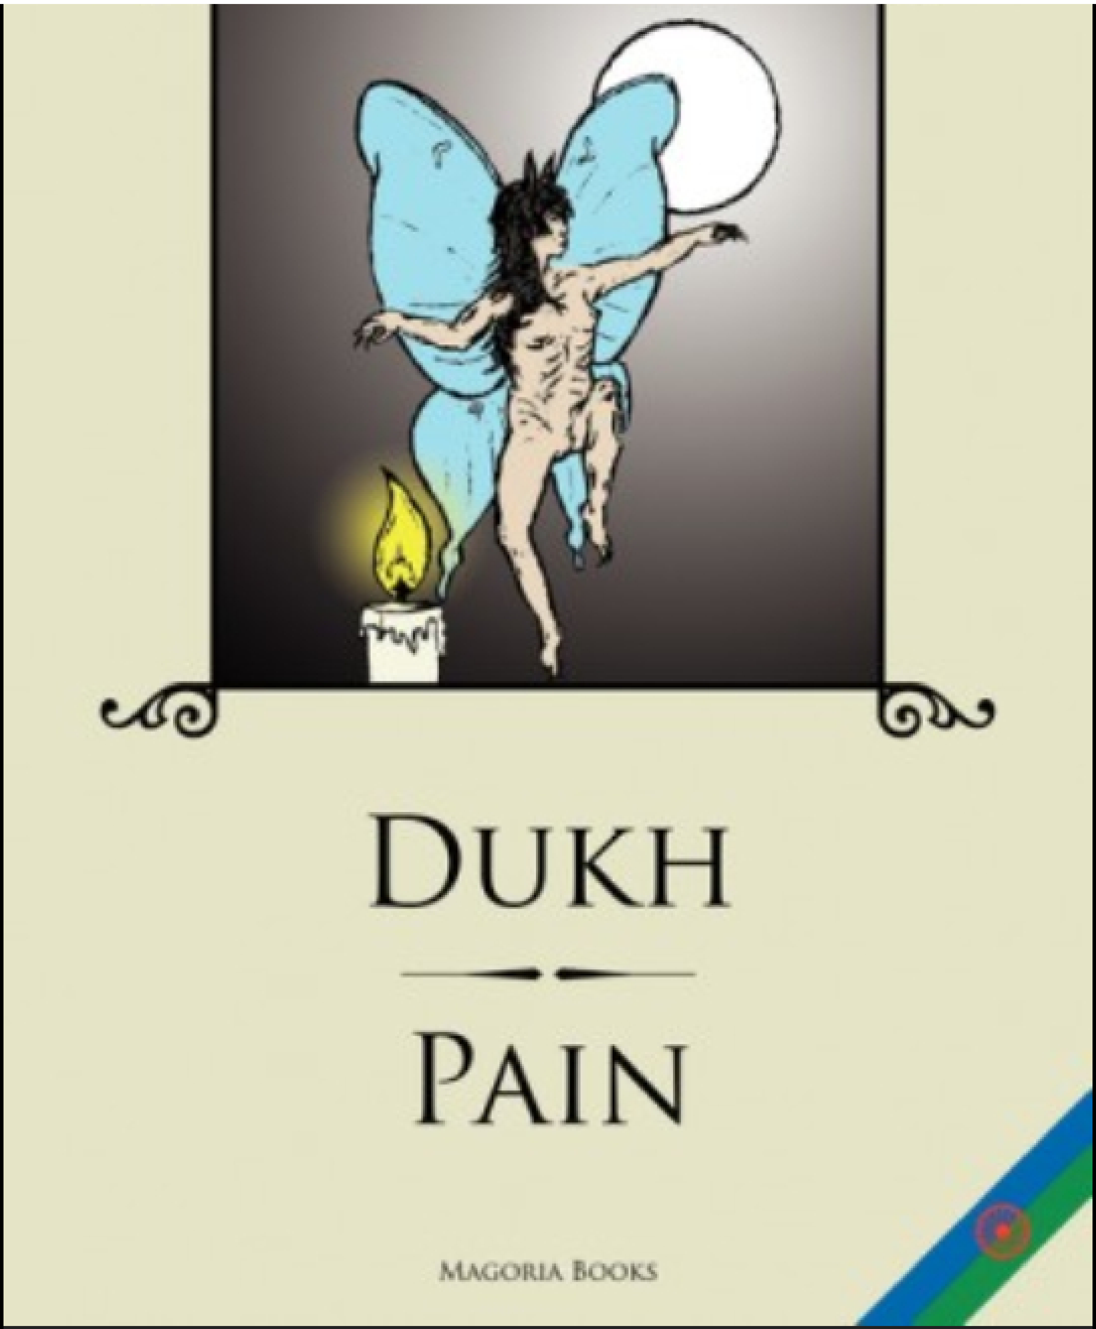
3. Read a Book





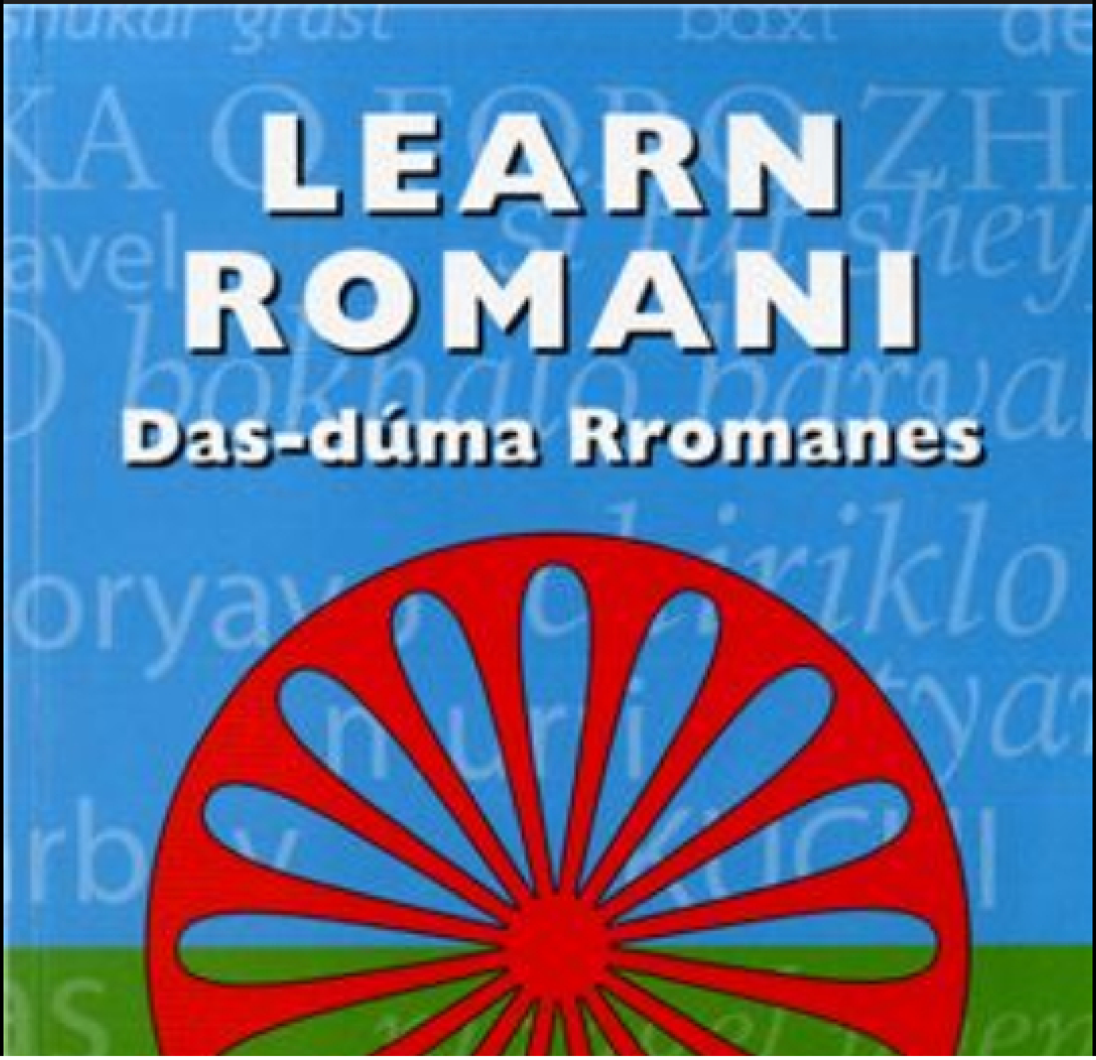
Romani authors are plentiful, and with a larger-than-ever presence of Roma on the internet, Romani books and poetry are becoming much more accessible. There are numerous books that have been translated from the Romani language in English, Russian, Hungarian, French, Spanish, and various other languages. A quick internet search can now produce comprehensive lists of ethnic Romani authors.

4. Buy Real "Gypsy" Fashion

Retailers, such as Romani Design, and the Tzigania Store, have made Romani-inspired clothing and jewelry accessible to and designed for both Roma and non-Roma. If you like traditional Romani motifs, purchasing clothing from a store like Romani Design not only supports ethnic Romani designers, but also allows you to consume Romani fashion in a way that is not appropriative.

If you'd like to learn more about appropriation versus appreciation, click here!

5. Learn a Language

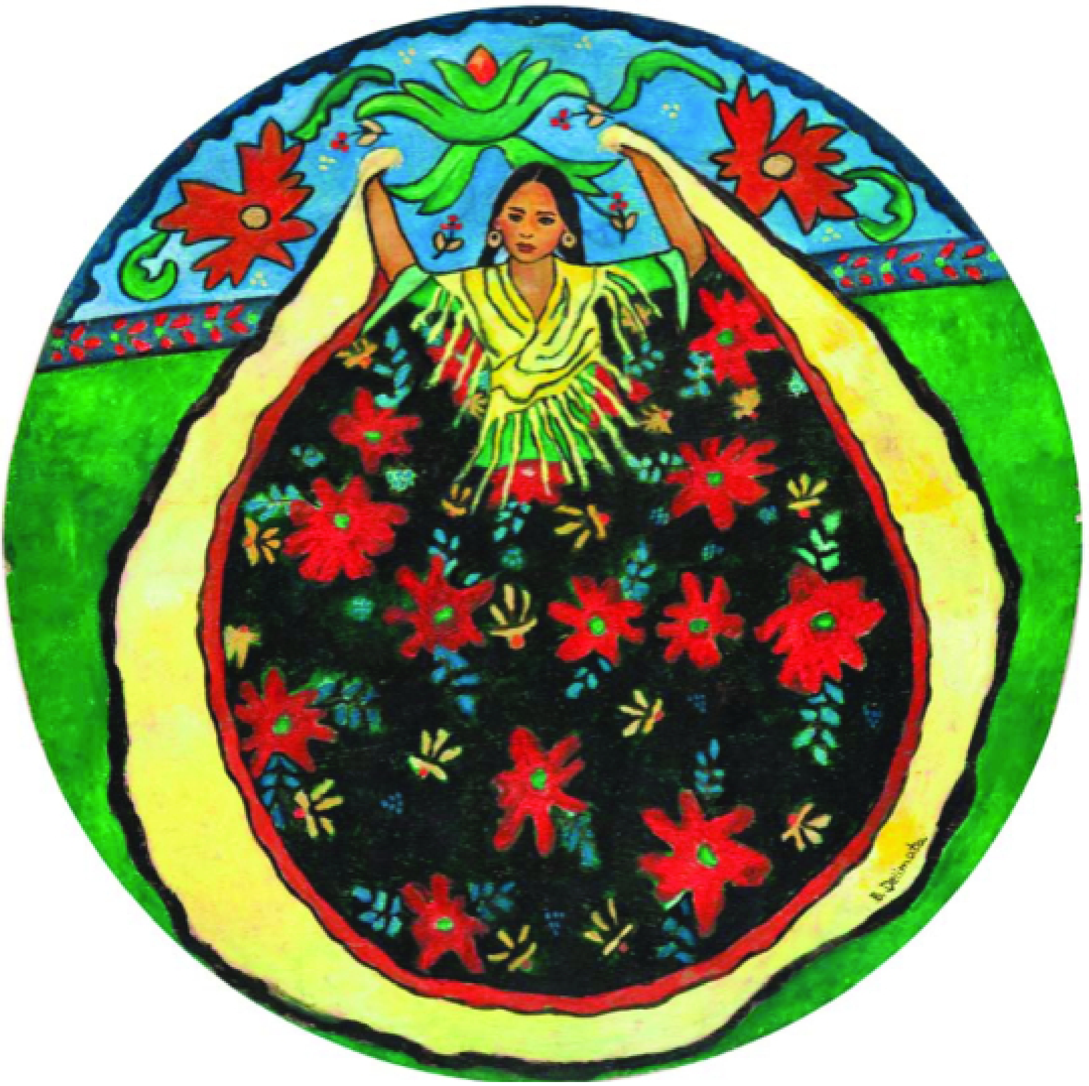


LEARN ROMANI

Das-dúma Rromanes

While Roma have varying opinions on non-Roma learning our language, generally speaking, learning a foreign language is one way to appreciate a different culture.There's also the added benefit that knowing more than one language has been proven to positively impact brain function. There are several reputable books and websites that can assist in Romani language learning endeavors.

6. Support Romani Art



Support Romani arts by purchasing Romani art, or going to galleries where Romani art is featured. As Roma, our traditional artwork is often overlooked and comes second to non-Romani depictions of us. Supporting Romani arts and efforts to preserve Romani arts has a profound impact on our communities, and allows you to appreciate Romani culture.

To learn more about Romani arts initiatives, click here!

7. Donate to Romani Causes

TÁRSASÁG
EGY TUDAT
TÁRSADAL

One way to appreciate Romani culture and ensure its preservation is to actively support Romani rights causes by donating to NGOs or participating in human rights events centered on Romani rights. There are numerous existing organizations that help Roma around the world. However, some of these organizations struggle to receive proper funding, or are promised funding that becomes tied up and “lost” by incompetent politicians.

For a list of Romani NGOs, click here!

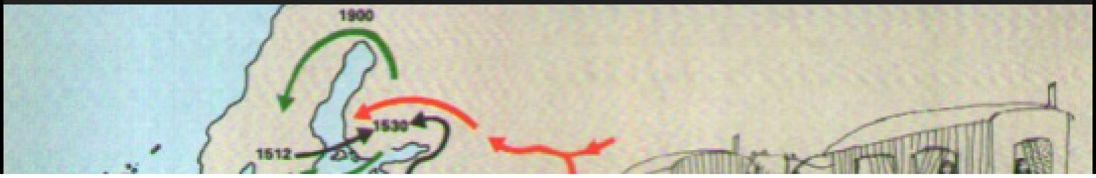
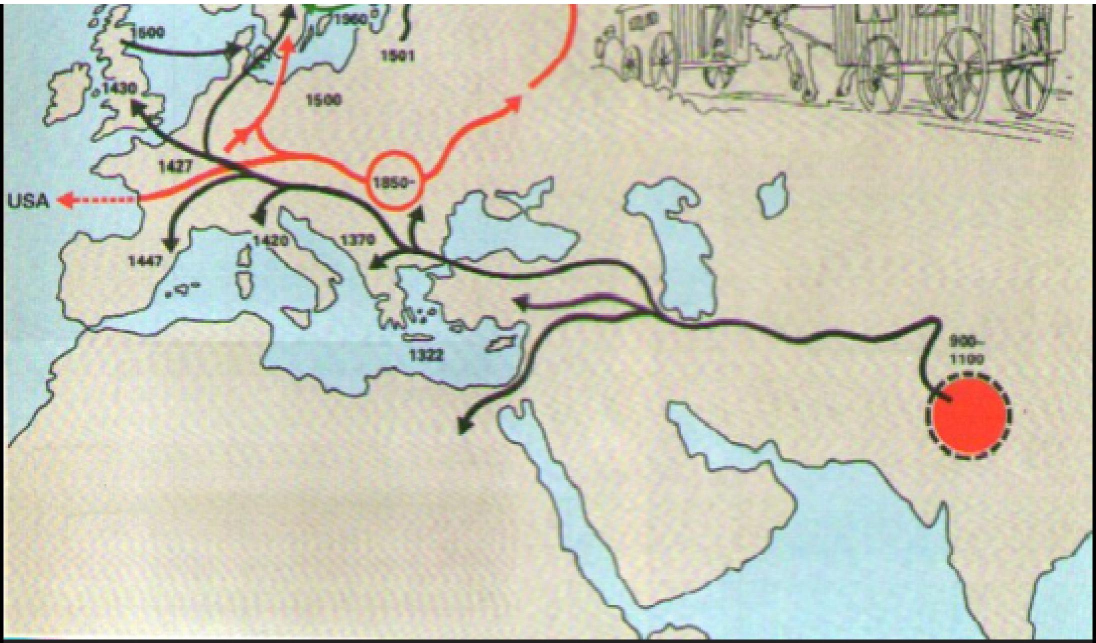
8. Learn Our History





1500
1960
1501
1430
1500
1427
1850-
USA
1420
1370
1447
1322
900-
1100

Learning about the history of our people and culture allows you to better appreciate it. Sometimes, history can help put culture into context. Why people continue to practice certain traditions can be as important as the tradition itself. Learning about the history of Romani people can also give non-Roma perspective as to why we keep certain aspects of our culture guarded. Understanding closed versus open cultures, and what that entails, can be a great way to show appreciation for a particular culture.

To learn more about Romani history, click here!

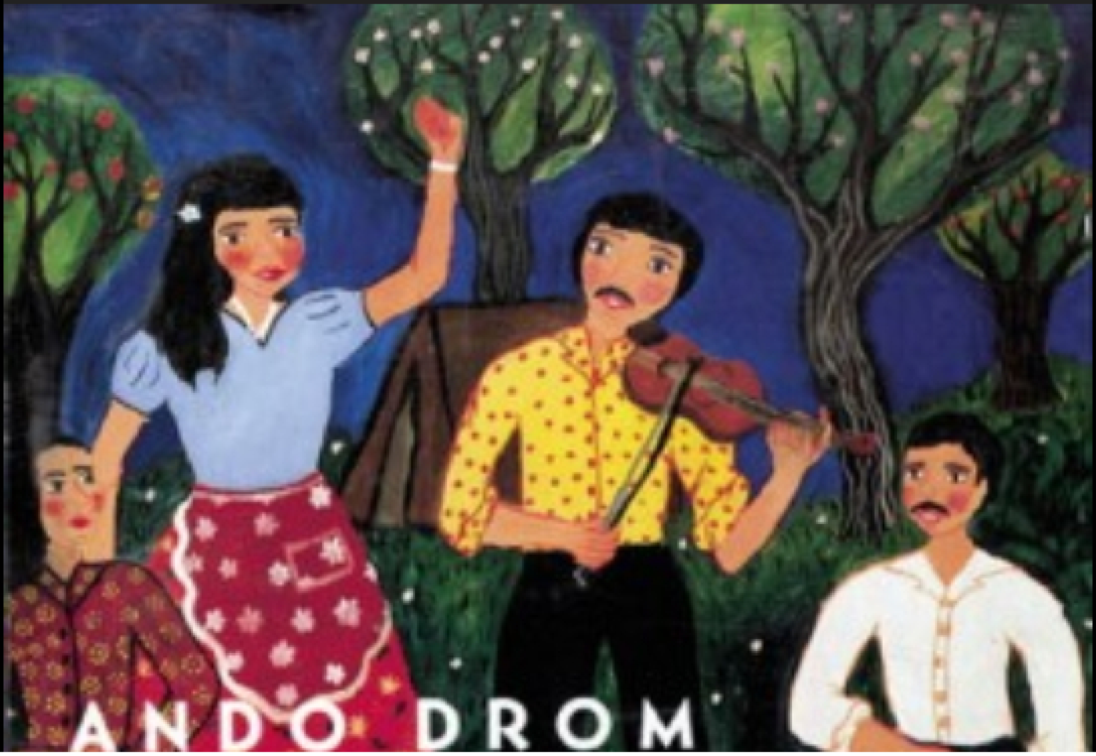
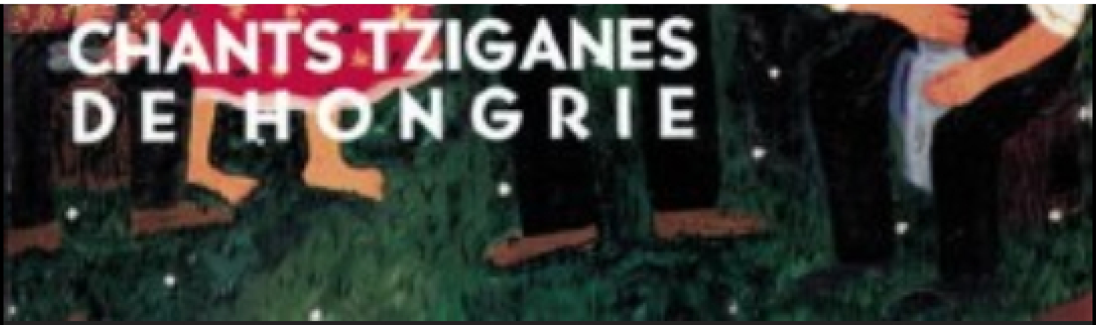
9. Listen to Music





Romani music is both diverse and beautiful. We have a rich musical history and our contributions to modern music genres are often underappreciated. We had a great influence in European classical music, as well as Jazz and Flamenco. Listening to Romani music is a great way to appreciate Romani culture. Some excellent musicians are Ando Drom, Esma Redzepova, Via Romen, and Gipsy Kings, among others. Check out this page for some more Romani musicians by country!

10. Lend an Ear

#Roma Are Equal

Sometimes the biggest appreciation we can give is to listen to people speak about their own culture. If we say something misrepresents us, or is offensive, it's probably because it is. There are many depictions of Roma that are steeped in racism, whether we realize it or not. If members of the Romani community ask you to respect our culture, the biggest appreciation you can give is just listening to us. Listening to ethnic Roma speak about our culture, or reading and sharing articles written by ethnic Roma are both ways of appreciating Romani culture.

this is so fucking funny like if u want ur drink earlier then come earlier dumb ass

johlyne
if their coffee order is so simple maybe they should just make it themselves at home djshahsdjk that would be the smart thing to do instead of insulting starbucks on twitter cause someone ordered a caramel frappe and u got all in ur feels about it

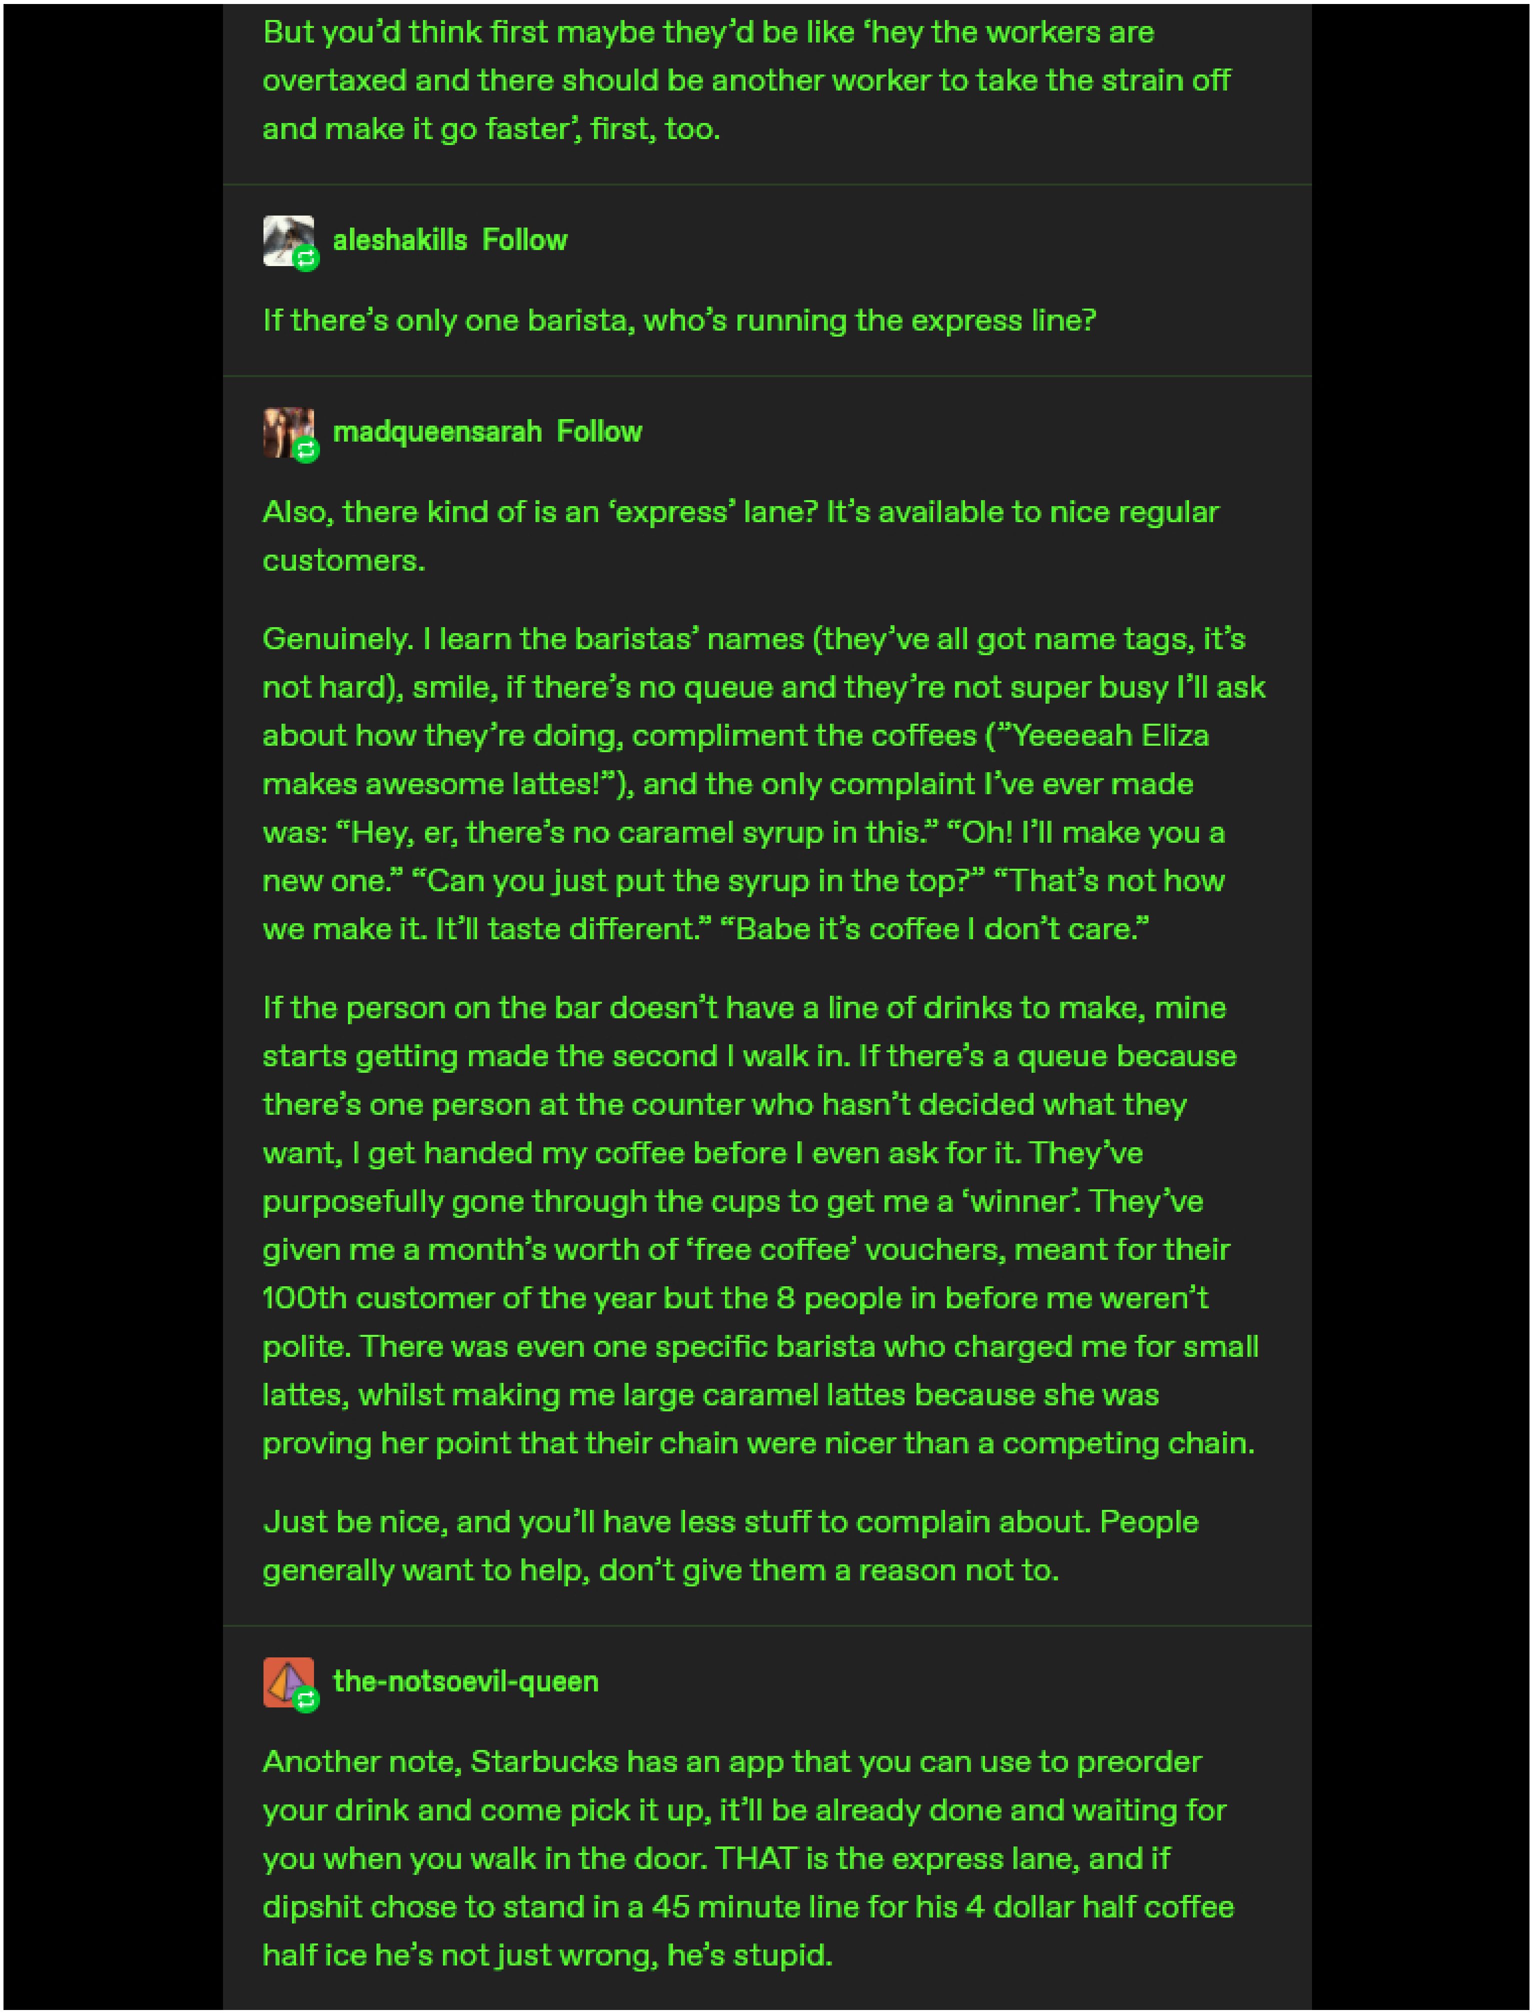
mockiato

That's a cheaper drink, too. 'Hey company, you should prioritize me because I spend less money at your establishment and feel superior to customers who order what your company is most known for' Not likely to make much headway



But you'd think first maybe they'd be like 'hey the workers are overtaxed and there should be another worker to take the strain off and make it go faster', first, too.

aleshakills Follow

If there's only one barista, who's running the express line?

madqueensarah Follow

Also, there kind of is an 'express' lane? It's available to nice regular customers.

Genuinely. I learn the baristas' names (they've all got name tags, it's not hard), smile, if there's no queue and they're not super busy I'll ask about how they're doing, compliment the coffees ("Yeeeeah Eliza makes awesome lattes!"), and the only complaint I've ever made was: "Hey, er, there's no caramel syrup in this." "Oh! I'll make you a new one." "Can you just put the syrup in the top?" "That's not how we make it. It'll taste different." "Babe it's coffee I don't care."

If the person on the bar doesn't have a line of drinks to make, mine starts getting made the second I walk in. If there's a queue because there's one person at the counter who hasn't decided what they want, I get handed my coffee before I even ask for it. They've purposefully gone through the cups to get me a 'winner'. They've given me a month's worth of 'free coffee' vouchers, meant for their 100th customer of the year but the 8 people in before me weren't polite. There was even one specific barista who charged me for small lattes, whilst making me large caramel lattes because she was proving her point that their chain were nicer than a competing chain.

Just be nice, and you'll have less stuff to complain about. People generally want to help, don't give them a reason not to.

the-notsoevil-queen

Another note, Starbucks has an app that you can use to preorder your drink and come pick it up, it'll be already done and waiting for you when you walk in the door. THAT is the express lane, and if dipshit chose to stand in a 45 minute line for his 4 dollar half coffee half ice he's not just wrong, he's stupid.

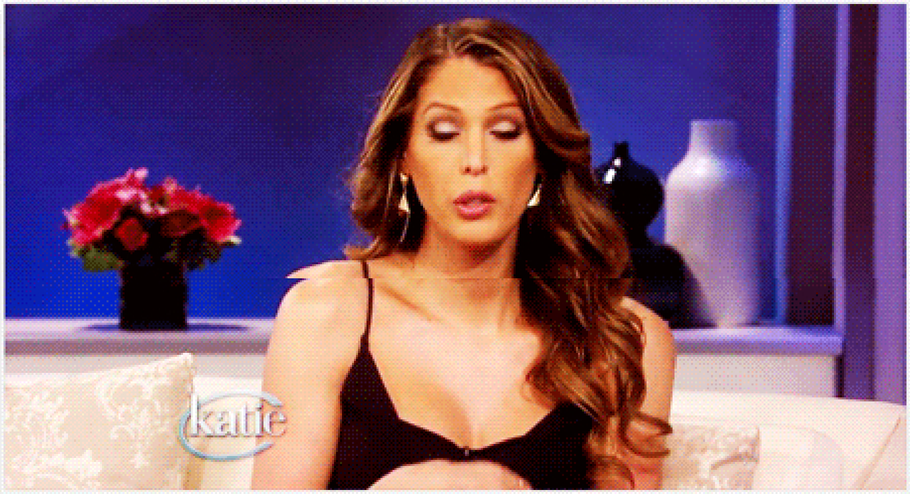
For all the strides transgender people have made lately, let’s not get too complacent about how far we’ve come because they still face a host of obstacles.

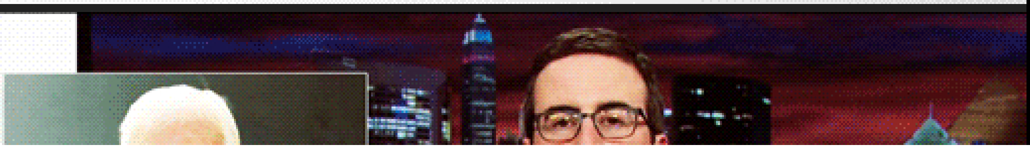
Even when the news media are trying to be supportive, they can make dumb mistakes.

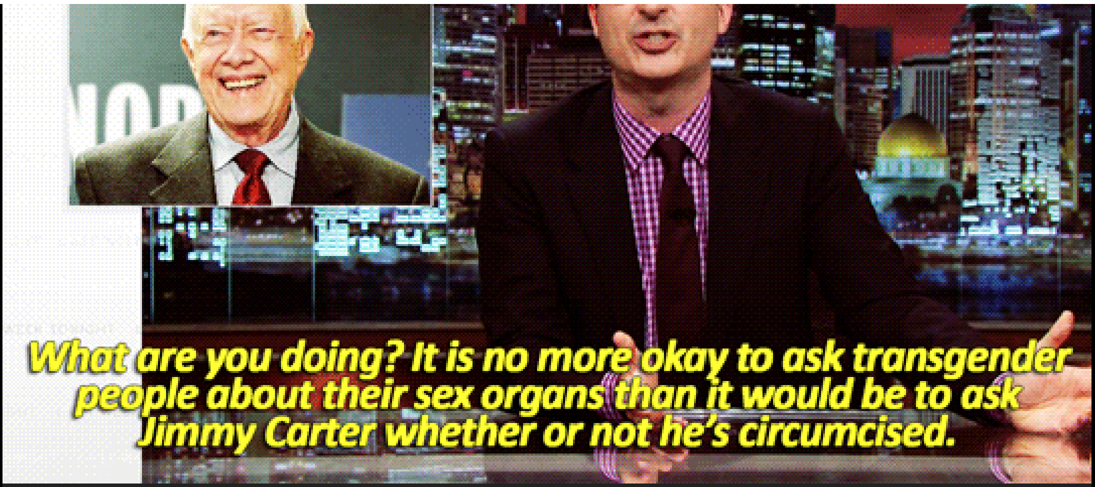
You private parts are different now, aren't they?



I don't want to talk about it because it's really personal.

So if I saw you undress, you would look like a woman to me totally? Yes?

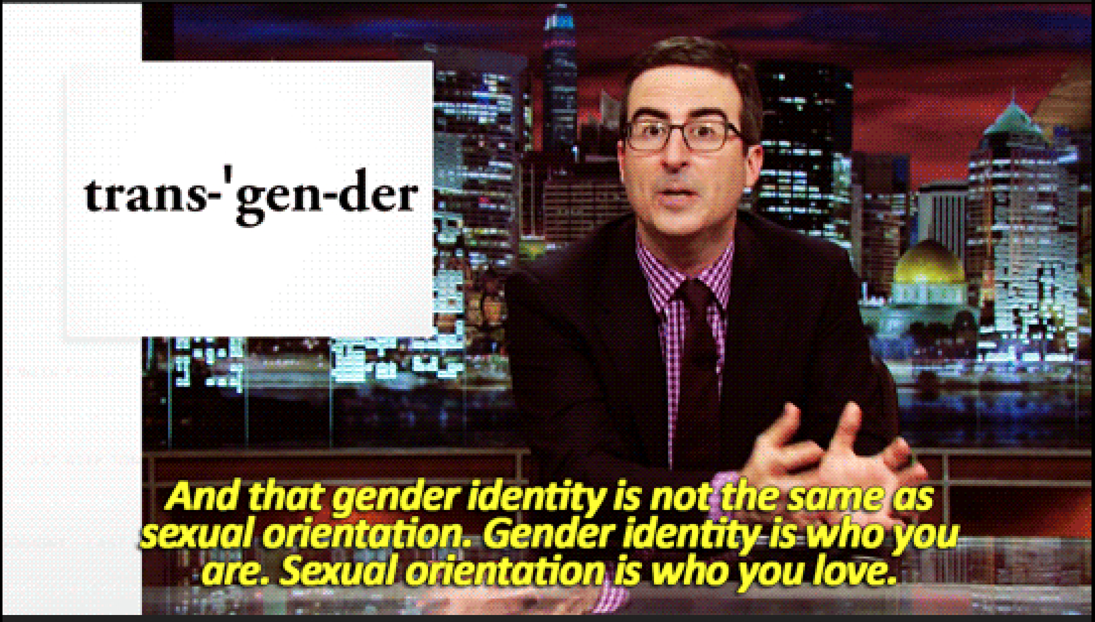




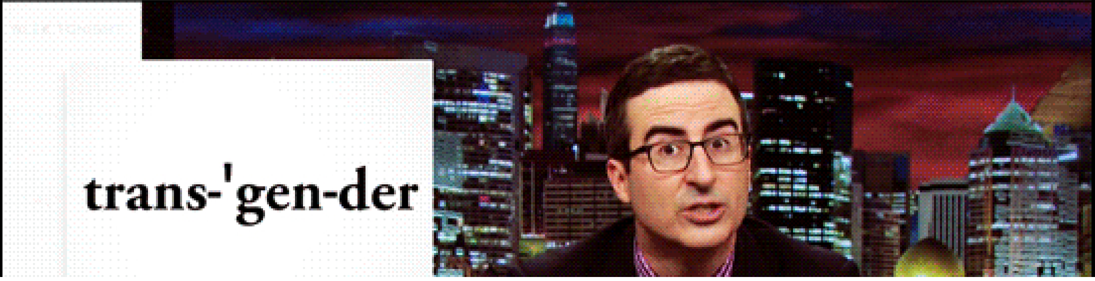
What are you doing? It is no more okay to ask transgender people about their sex organs than it would be to ask Jimmy Carter whether or not he's circumcised.

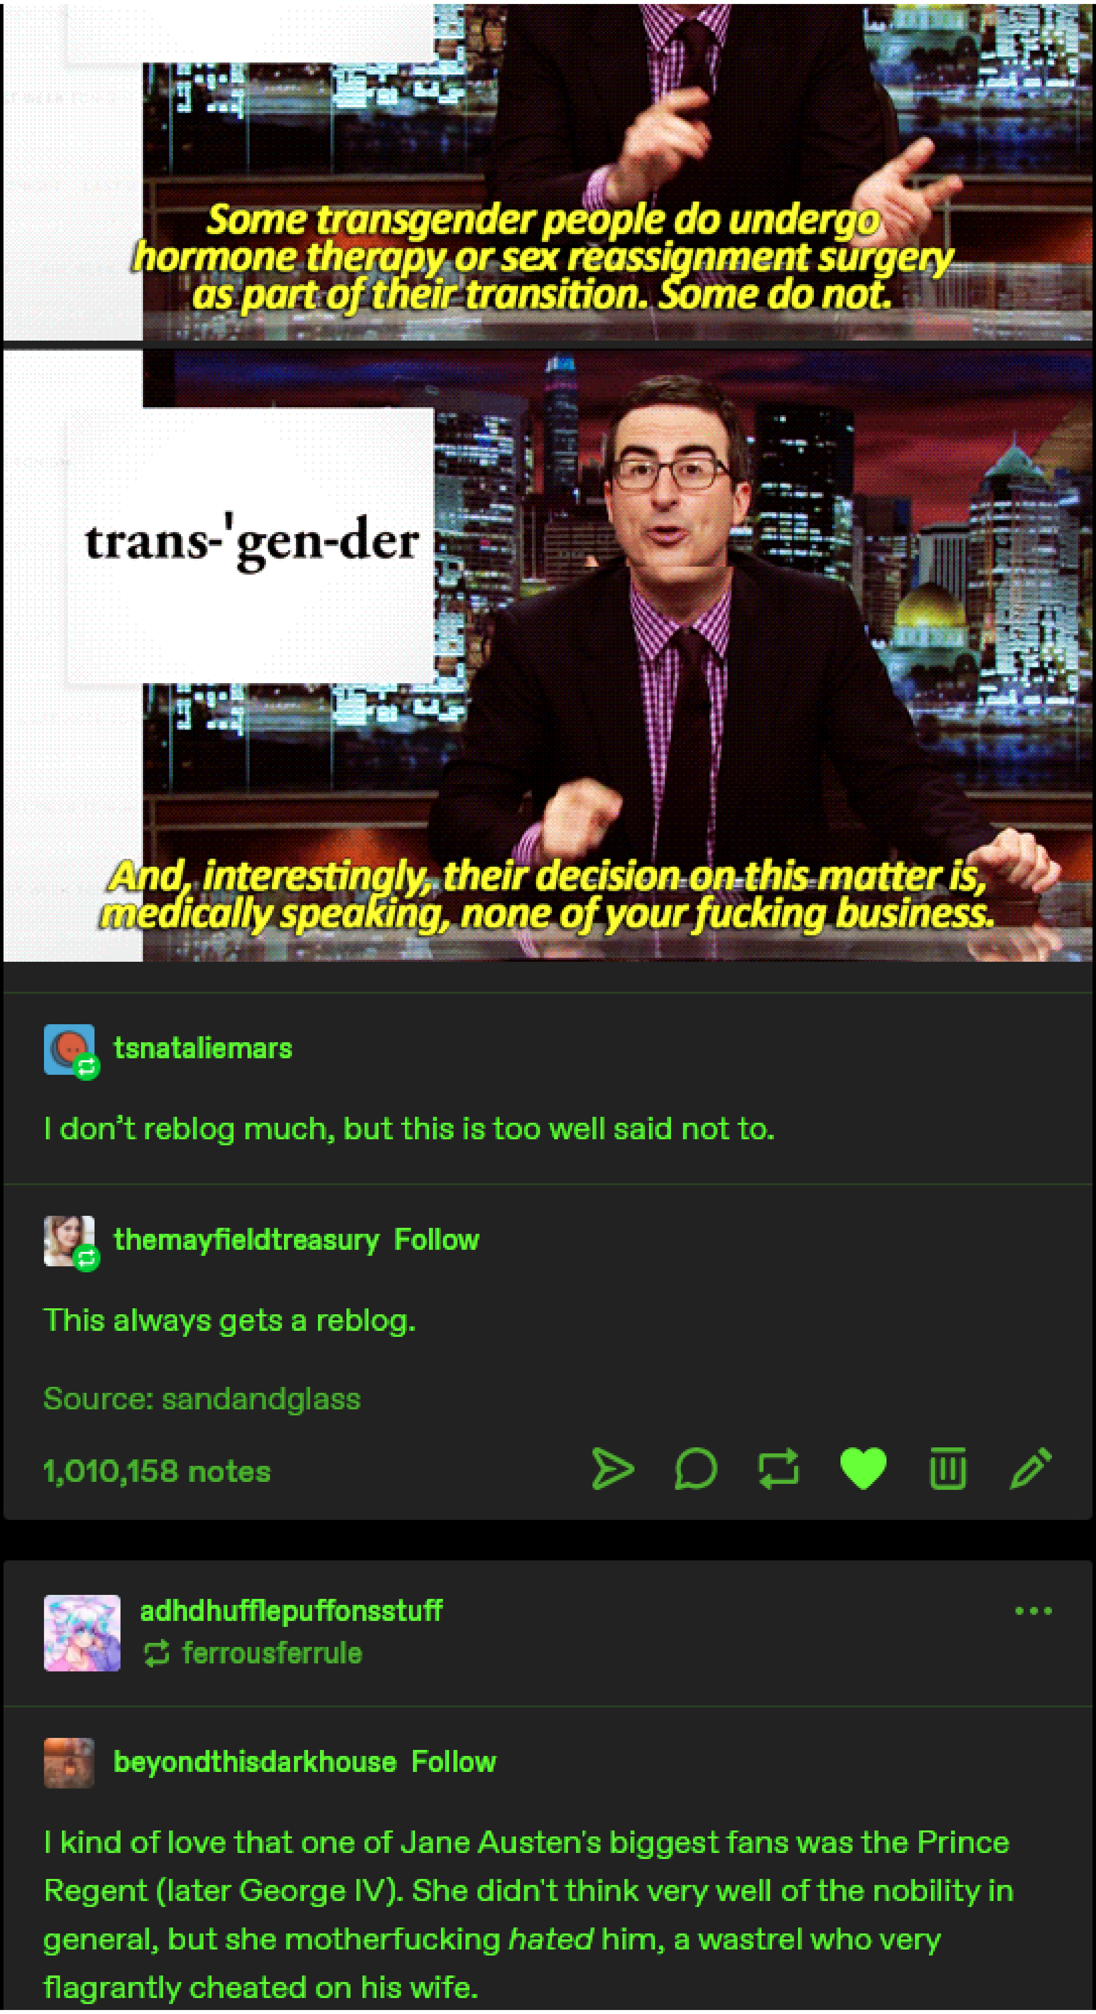
trans-'gen-der

Transgender people have a gender identity that differs from the one they were assigned at birth.



And that gender identity is not the same as sexual orientation. Gender identity is who you are. Sexual orientation is who you love.





Some transgender people do undergo hormone therapy or sex reassignment surgery as part of their transition. Some do not.

trans-'gen-der

And, interestingly, their decision on this matter is, medically speaking, none of your fucking business.

I kind of love that one of Jane Austen's biggest fans was the Prince Regent (later George IV). She didn't think very well of the nobility in general, but she motherfucking hated him, a wastrel who very flagrantly cheated on his wife.

But he loved her writing, was the first recorded purchaser of Sense and Sensibility, and kept copies of her books in all his residences. She never made enough from her writing to live on during her lifetime, so this wasn't support she could casually toss aside. His librarian kept suggesting ideas for new books to her, which she turned down with exquisite politeness. Much to her aggravation, she found herself obliged to dedicate Emma to the man.

I am appalled at this place, my husband went shopping here with his mother and after she decided to purchase a few items he stepped outside to wait for her on the sidewalk in front of the store, he finds out as his mother is checking out that somehow he took his mask of so AGGRESSIVELY and stuck it in his pocket so forcefully that they were going to go outside and assault him with a baseball bat. ARE YOU KIDDING ME??? I Relocated here solely to work at this hospital and this is how my husband is treated?? I warn anyone if you shop at this location your might be assaulted for walking too fast down the aisle because it might be seen as "aggressive behavior."

★★★★★ Just now

I love this place. It's huge and there's good variety. I accidentally spent 2 hours in there when I thought I had been in there for 20 minutes, it's just that sort of store. Some items are a little overpriced but that's the fault of the vender and not the store itself. Contrary to the other reviews, I was not chased with a baseball bat even once. Use good mask protocol and you will be fine.

review I just left after buying $150 worth of records there :)

violence is not bad especially when you're a little old man selling antiques for your livelihood and people keep threatening your life by attempting to infect you with a deadly virus

Loki was always an agent of chaos. Its like one of his many nicknames. Now even that was given to someone else. Don't tell me Marvel doesnt do him dirty.

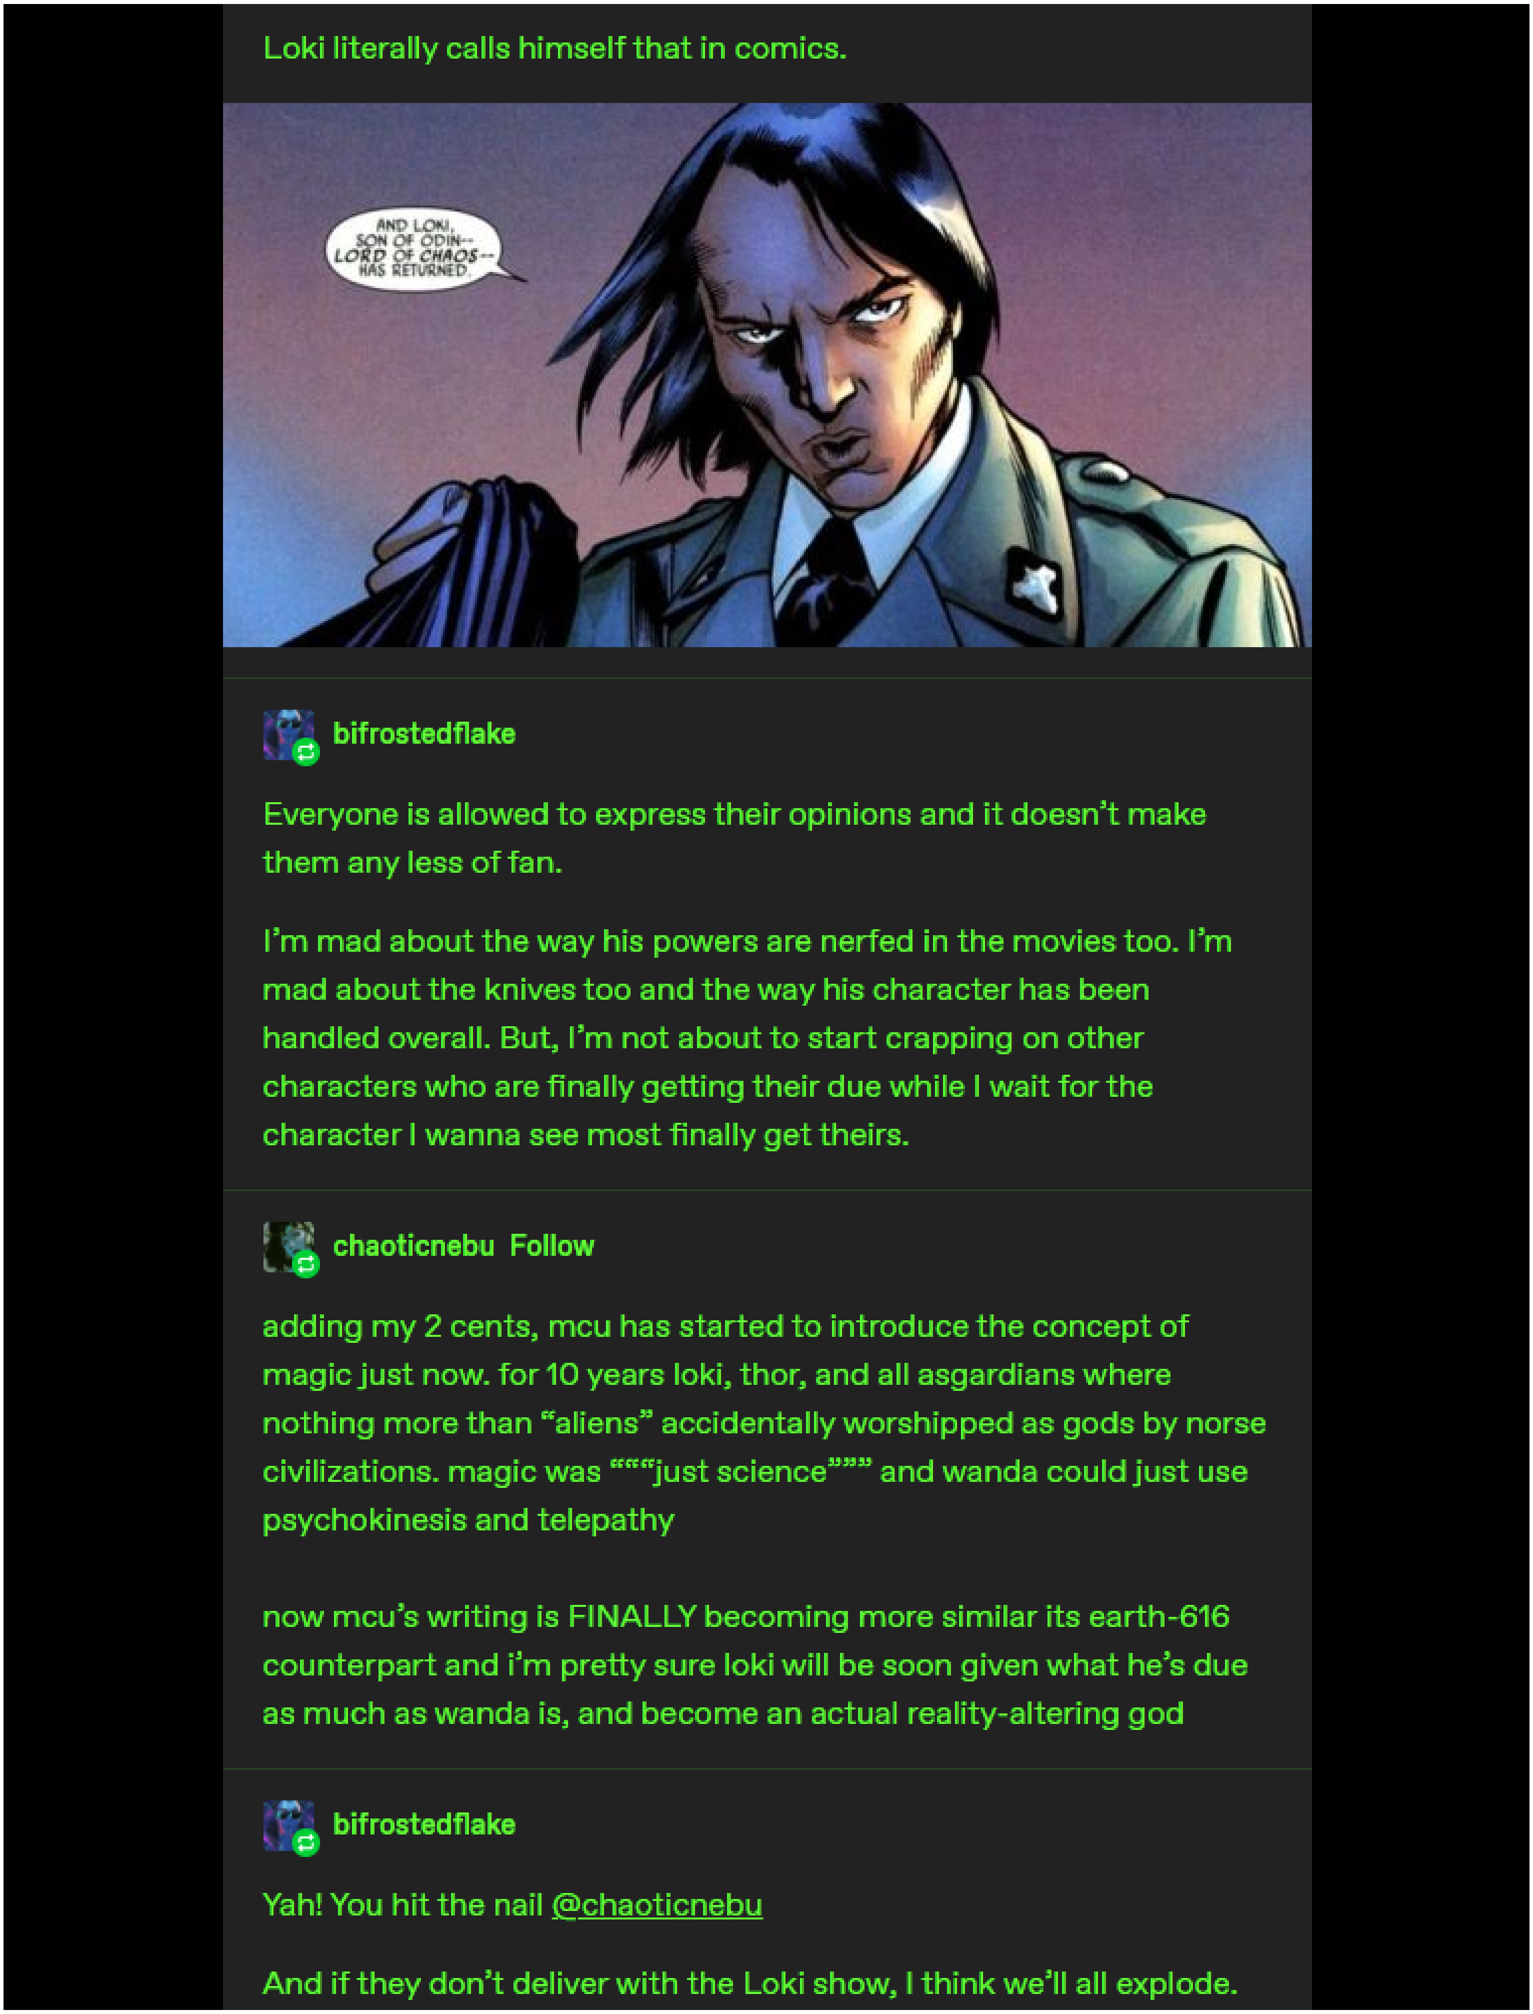
bifrostedflake

I'm sorry but I don't agree with this. Nothing has been taken from Loki. Nobody has come out and said, Loki is no longer an agent of chaos. Absolutely nobody has said this. Loki doesn't have to use chaos magic like Wanda to be considered an agent of Chaos. Loki will always be this, but it's okay for another character to be a force of chaos too.

Wanda, in the comics, has canonically wielded chaos magic for a long while. It's part of her story.

allaboutloki

Another so called Loki fan who is ok with others gaining more and more powers while he runs like fool with knives.



Loki literally calls himself that in comics.

bifrostedflake

Everyone is allowed to express their opinions and it doesn't make them any less of fan.

I'm mad about the way his powers are nerfed in the movies too. I'm mad about the knives too and the way his character has been handled overall. But, I'm not about to start crapping on other characters who are finally getting their due while I wait for the character I wanna see most finally get theirs.

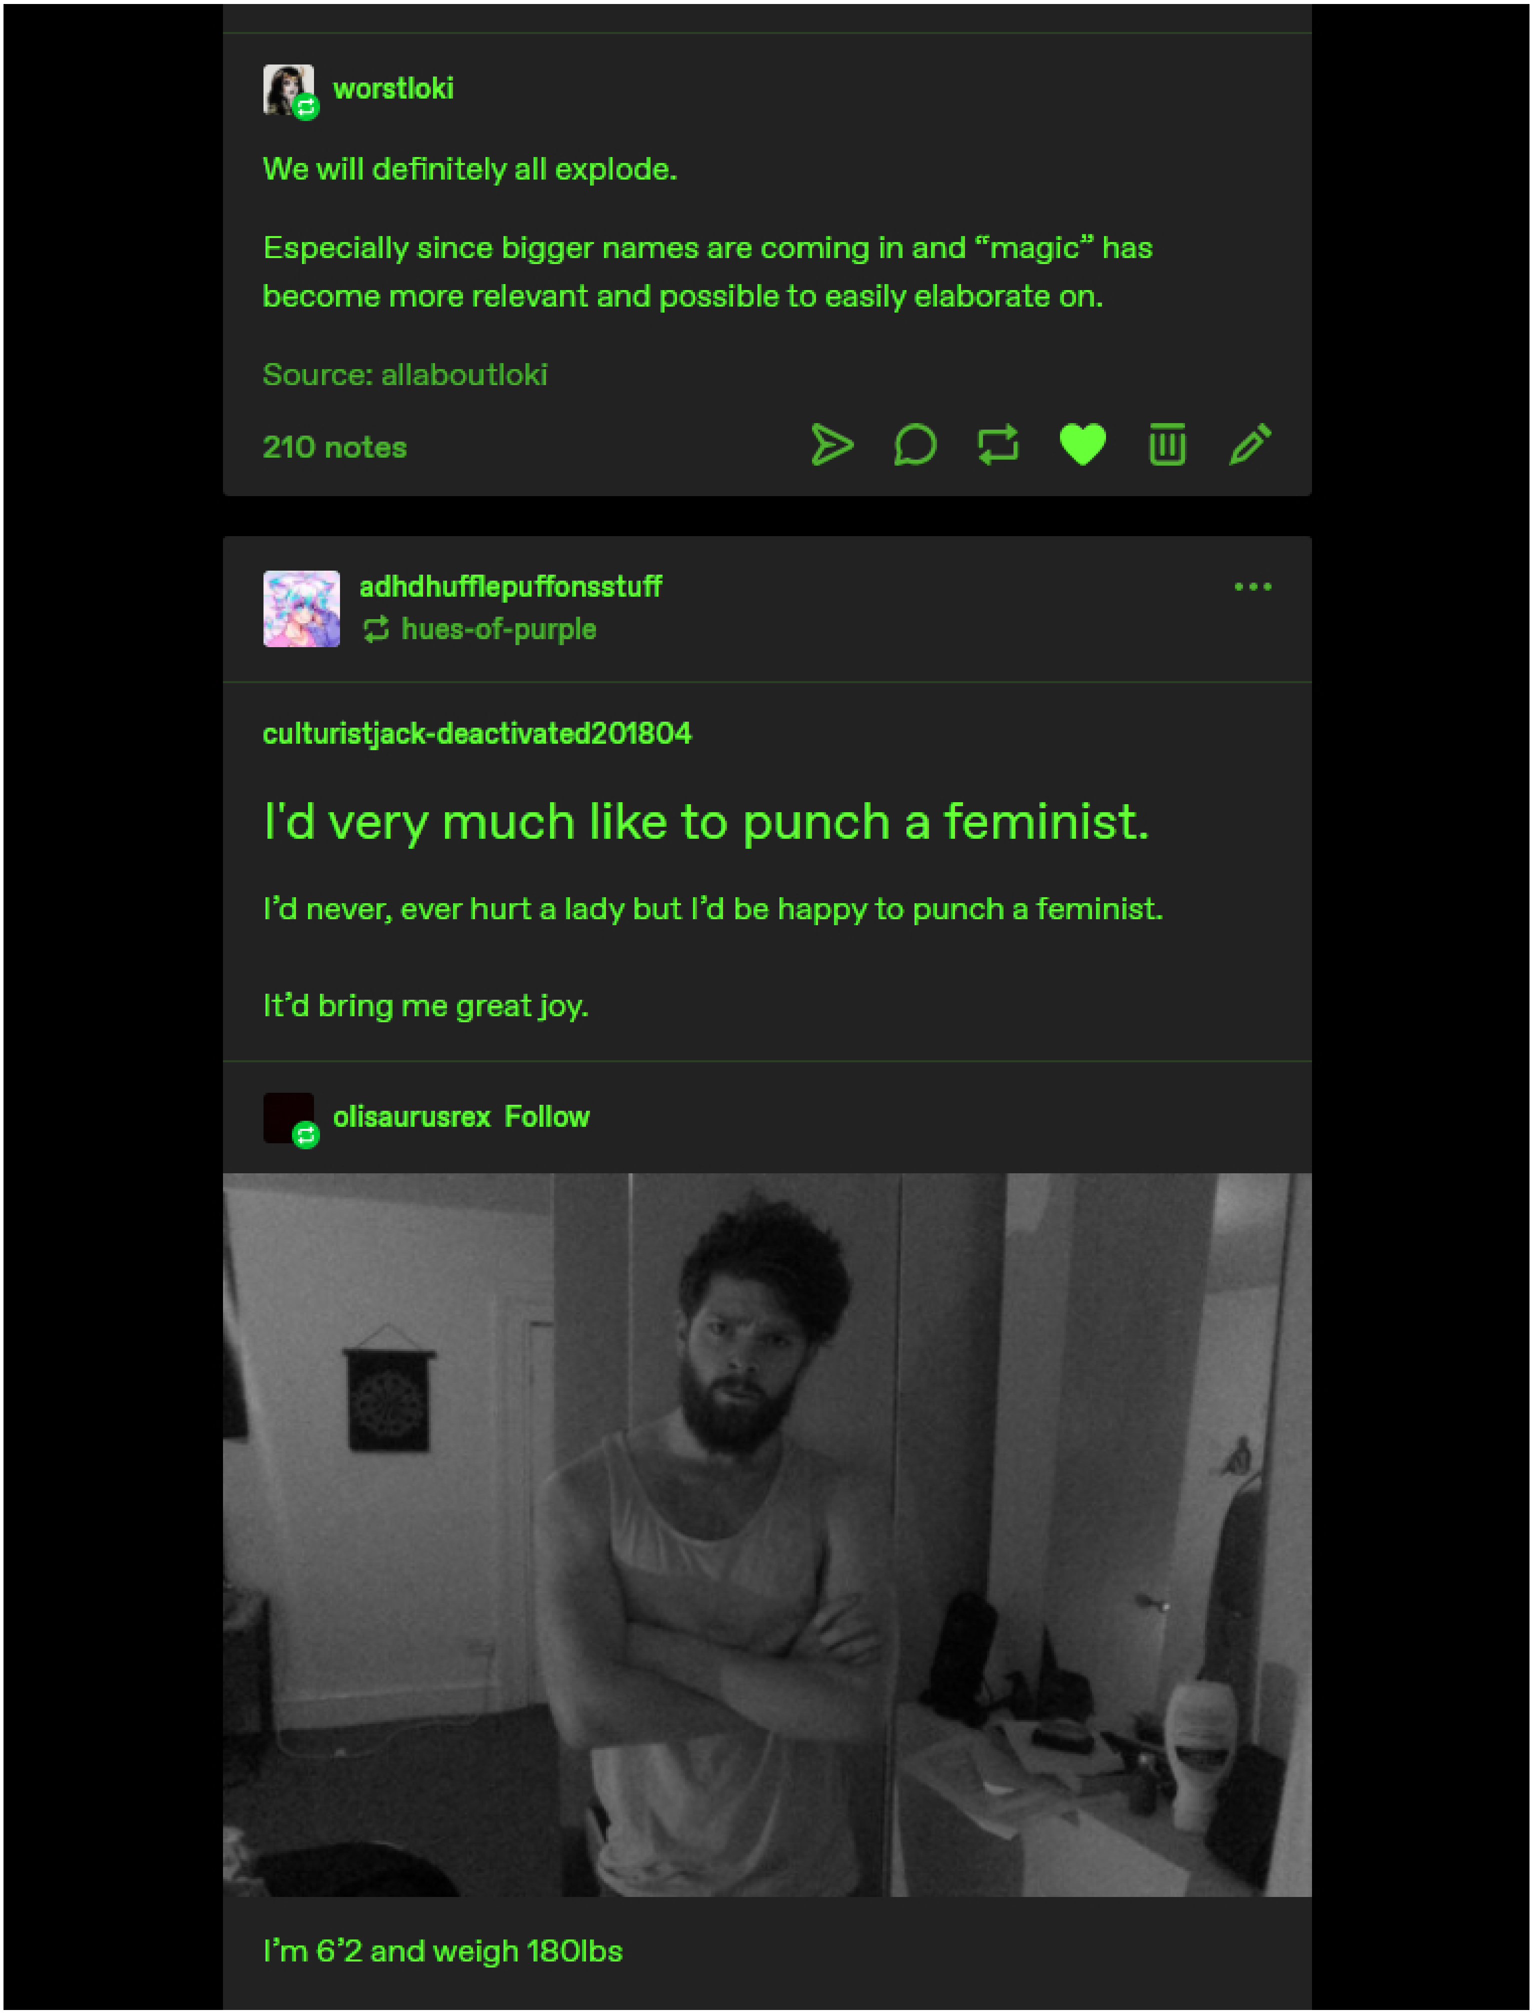
chaoticnebu Follow adding my 2 cents, mcu has started to introduce the concept of magic just now. for 10 years loki, thor, and all asgardians where nothing more than "aliens" accidentally worshipped as gods by norse civilizations. magic was """just science""" and wanda could just use psychokinesis and telepathy

now mcu's writing is FINALLY becoming more similar its earth-616 counterpart and i'm pretty sure loki will be soon given what he's due as much as wanda is, and become an actual reality-altering god

bifrostedflake

Yah! You hit the nail @chaoticnebu

And if they don't deliver with the Loki show, I think we'll all explode.



worstloki

We will definitely all explode.

Especially since bigger names are coming in and “magic” has become more relevant and possible to easily elaborate on.

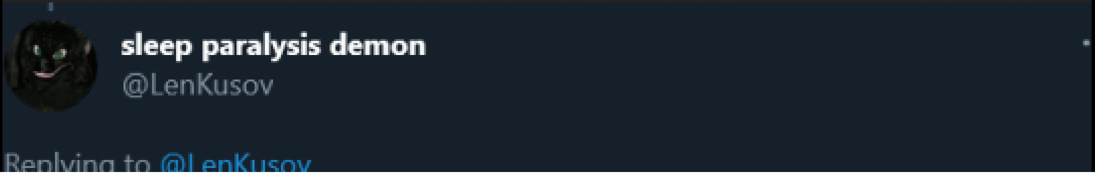
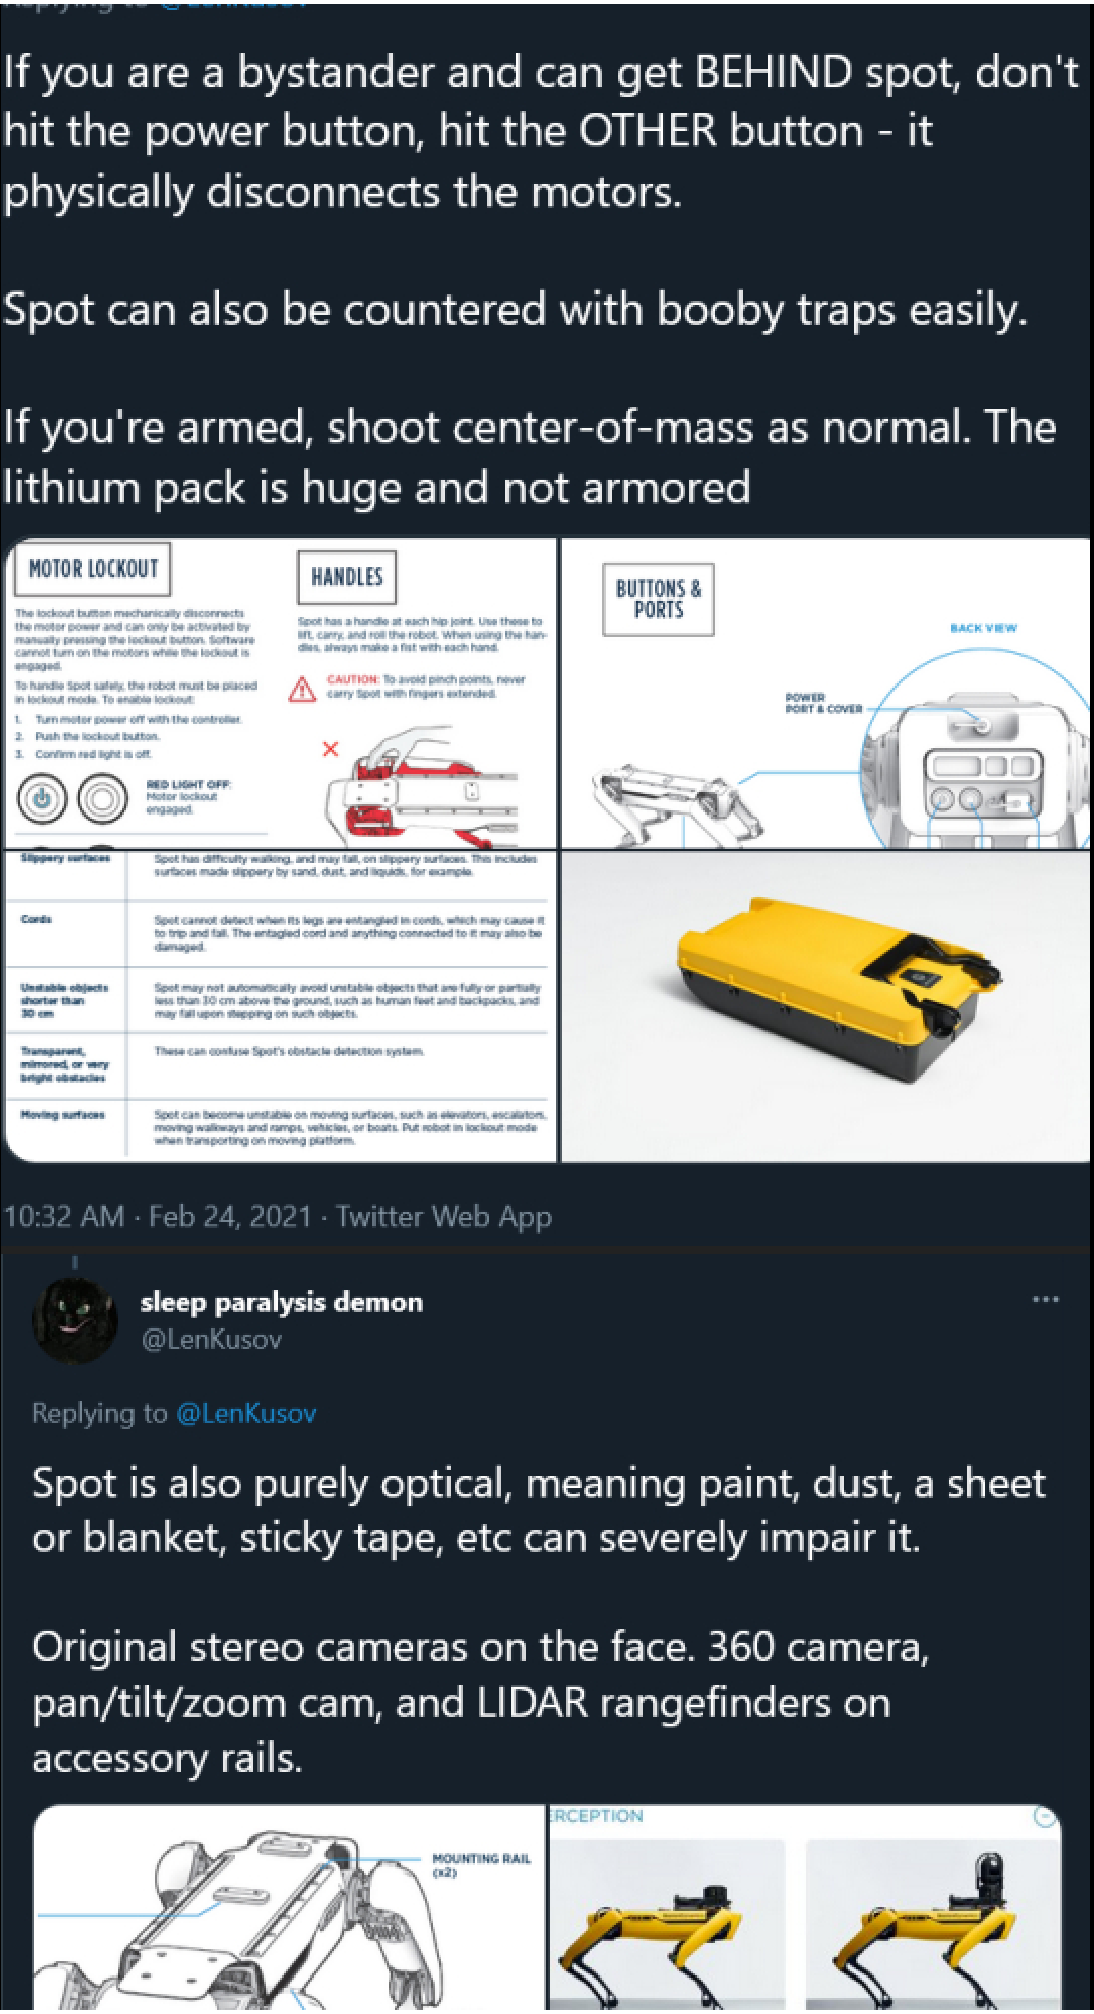
PSA: if you or someone nearby are being brutalized by a police Spot robot and can get a hand or something underneath, grab this handle and yank it forward. This releases the battery, instantly disabling the robot.

Keep your hands away from joints, Spot WILL crush your fingers.



sleep paralysis demon
@LenKusov

Replying to @LenKusov



If you are a bystander and can get BEHIND spot, don't hit the power button, hit the OTHER button - it physically disconnects the motors.

Spot can also be countered with booby traps easily.

If you're armed, shoot center-of-mass as normal. The lithium pack is huge and not armored

MOTOR LOCKOUT

The lockout button mechanically disconnects the motor power and can only be activated by manually pressing the lockout button. Software cannot turn on the motors while the lockout is engaged.

To handle Spot safely, the robot must be placed in lockout mode. To enable lockout:

1. Turn motor power off with the controller.
2. Push the lockout button.
3. Confirm red light is off.

RED LIGHT OFF: Motor lockout engaged.

HANDLES

Spot has a handle at each hip joint. Use these to lift, carry, and roll the robot. When using the handles, always make a fist with each hand.

CAUTION: To avoid pinch points, never carry Spot with fingers extended.

BUTTONS & PORTS

Slippery surfaces	Spot has difficulty walking, and may fall, on slippery surfaces. This includes surfaces made slippery by sand, dust, and liquids, for example.
Cords	Spot cannot detect when its legs are entangled in cords, which may cause it to trip and fall. The entagled cord and anything connected to it may also be damaged.
Unstable objects shorter than 30 cm	Spot may not automatically avoid unstable objects that are fully or partially less than 30 cm above the ground, such as human feet and backpacks, and may fall upon stepping on such objects.
Transparent, mirrored, or very bright obstacles	These can confuse Spot's obstacle detection system.
Moving surfaces	Spot can become unstable on moving surfaces, such as elevators, escalators, moving walkways and ramps, vehicles, or boats. Put robot in lockout mode when transporting on moving platform.

Spot is also purely optical, meaning paint, dust, a sheet or blanket, sticky tape, etc can severely impair it.
